THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

Deacon & Peterson, Publishers,
NUMBER SIXTY-SIX SOUTH THIRD ST.

Two Dollars Per Annum, In Advance.
THREE DOLLARS IF NOT PAID IN ADVANCE.

EDMUND DEACON, HENRY PETERSON, } EDITORS AND PROPRIETORS.

A FAMILY NEWSPAPER: NEUTRAL IN POLITICS.

CLUBS.—FOR TERMS TO CLUBS SEE PROSPECTUS ON NEXT PAGE.

DEVOTED TO MORALITY, PURE LITERATURE, FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC NEWS, AGRICULTURE, THE COMMERCIAL INTEREST, SCIENCE, ART AND AMUSEMENT.

ESTABLISHED AUGUST 4, 1821. PHILADELPHIA, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1855. WHOLE NUMBER ISSUED 1794.

Original Poetry.

ADELINE.

WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, BY ALICE CARY.

One time I heard the borrowed notes
Of robins, all the twilight through,
When girls came home with petticoats
Pressed heavy with the mid-May dew;

I heard, as though I did not hear,
I saw, as though I did not see,
The present shadow in true deal
Thus shadows cast from memory.

Shadows that rise in me everywhere
When first the cloudy sunrise blushes,
I seem to see my teen's black hair
Tangling along the garden rushes

We came together to the door
Of our sweet home, that is to be,
And knocking, she went in before
To put on marriage robes, for me

Her weary work to rest so long,
But true love known and love to doubt—
God's wisdom fashions scarcely wrong
That we may end right meetings out

Pictures of Life.

SEE HER AT HOME.

BY FRANCES BROWNE.

CHAPTER I.

"Well, Charles," said Mr. Lesley to his nephew, "you know I don't care who you marry—that is," he added, in an explanatory tone, "provided the lady be respectable and to your liking—you are old enough to choose for yourself; you are rich enough for a sensible man, but take my advice, never trust to outside appearances, especially in women."

"Why, uncle, do you think the sex so deceitful?" said Charles.

"No, my boy; deceit is not peculiar to any division of mankind, but as their education, duties, and course of life are generally speaking more private than ours, their real character is less visible in society, and to know a woman's genuine disposition, one must see her at home."

The conversation above quoted took place in a handsome castellated mansion, called Oakwood Hall, from the park of noble trees in the aisles of which it stood on the banks of the Severn. Mr. Lesley had inherited the hall and surrounding estate from his ancestors, who had lived there as country gentlemen before the Reformation, for the Lesleys were one of the oldest families in Somersetshire. The repute of a good landlord and a hospitable householder, had regularly descended from father to son; but none of his name were ever more beloved by the tenantry, or respected by neighboring squires than the present proprietor. He had seen much of the world in youth—having travelled more than the sons of country gentlemen were wont to do—and studied at foreign universities; but it was his sound sense and sincere benevolence that gave Mr. Lesley an honorable notoriety in his neighborhood. People of all ranks put faith in the owner of Oakwood Hall, and there was a popular belief that nothing could be done well without him at either sessions or vestry. Mr. Lesley's hair was growing grey, and he had no son to succeed him—one bomb-stone marked the grave of his three young children in the parish churchyard; but, with Mrs. Lesley's concurrence, he had adopted the son of an elder sister who had grown up in his house, gone thence to college and returned, as like his uncle, the tenants said, as he could look. The young man was in his twenty-third year. He had taken the name of Lesley, and nephew and uncle set conversing in what was called the tea room of that old manor-house, a comfortable though antiquated parlor, opening into the ancient orangery or greenhouse, in a soft evening of autumn.

Charles Lesley had lately been at a country ball, and there saw a delightful Miss Trimmer, some observations concerning whom had brought on a grave discourse touching ladies in general, and his own future choice in particular.

"Well, uncle," said the young man, "you ought to know, after twenty years of married life. That, of course gives experience."

"Hold, nephew. I know you are going to jest," said his uncle, good humoredly. "Twenty years of anything should make one experienced, but I got a strong lesson some six months before my wedding day, and as your aunt won't be here till tea time—she always likes to talk a while with the cottagers in her walk—I'll tell you the story."

You know that I was an only child and lost my mother early. My father loved me, he used to say, double, for himself and her. From my infancy he gave me the best opportunities; took extraordinary pride in my abilities, real and imaginary; and allowed me to much of my own way that it was a mercy I did not fall into mischief. It is, however, among my chief causes of thankfulness that Providence preserved me from ever doing anything to vex that kindly heart; though on one point, I must acknowledge myself to have gone to the very borders of disobedience. I had returned from the travels of which our neighbors still talk—some but nobleman's sons thought of the like in those days. My age was about your own; everybody petted me to my father, and he was proud to show me off in Bristol, where we went to spend the Christmas time with an old friend, and see the great world—Bristol being in my youth a kind of capital for all the adjoining counties. Things in general are doubtless much improved, but young people can form no idea of the metropolitan character enjoyed by provincial towns in times when London was considered too far off, and dangerous for more than one visit in the course of a life. The ancient commerce and wealth of Bristol gave it a pre-eminence in this respect, notwithstanding the neighborhood of Bath. Its genteel families maintained among themselves a degree of style and fashion, which though somewhat antiquated, was quite as engrossing and exclusive as that of Belgravia. They had their own code of ten, enforced with old-fashioned rigor, their own gay season in which belles reigned, young ladies were brought out, and the Somerset and Gloucestershire gentry came to occupy their town houses. Our family kept nothing of the kind; my father preferred planting trees and improving his farms, to all the formal gaieties of Bristol, and I had seen too much of foreign cities to care for them; but our friend Captain Fitzpatrick had made us promise to spend Christmas with him in the new house, which, to use his own words, he "built for head quarters," when the old merchant whose life he had saved in a shipwreck, bequeathed him ten thousand pounds, and he retired from the army after thirty years' service.

Captain Fitzpatrick was, as his name might inform you, an Irishman. Like most sons of the Green Isle, he loved a joke in his heart, and was still more clever than cautious, in spite of his fifty years; but all acquainted with the Captain knew him to be both just and generous, an honorable man, and a right trusty friend. My father had made his acquaintance when first visiting Bath with his bride. Their friendship had been cemented by a thousand mutual services, and now that the Captain had settled down at Bristol, nothing would satisfy him but that his old and young friends, as he called us both, should warm his new house by a month's visit in mid-winter. The Captain was unmarried. He used to say, whether in jest or earnest I never knew, that the finest girl in all Leinster had made him a bachelor; but he kept his own old nurse, a capital housekeeper, though she was near seventy, and was the most ardent adviser to matrimony within my knowledge.

In these counsels my father concurred as far as I was concerned; he wished me to marry, and think of travelling no more; and in all his conversations with me on that subject, I must do him the justice to say that neither family nor fortune was set forth as the chief requisite. He generally wound up with the following exhortation, "Whatever you do, Frank, bring me home a good daughter-in-law, one as like your mother as you can find."

That honest injunction found an echo in my mind. Though then young, I had learned to look earnestly on life, and knew that deficiencies in heart or understanding could be but poorly compensated by any external advantage. So far I was right, but youth has much to learn. In my admiration of goodness, I had forgotten my own short-comings, and set up for myself an image of ideal excellence, which if ever found "below the stars," must be too perfect to mate with an ordinary mortal. There might have been a dash of romance caught at the German colleges, for before I had helped to warm the Captain's house, a week, it seemed to me that my dream of perfection was all but realized.

Though social, popular, and not over serious, Captain Fitzpatrick took little part in what was called the gay society of Bristol. He said he was too old to dangle after girls, and his time was growing too short to be lost on cards and dowagers, so the Captain diligently eschewed balls, assemblies, and parties of large pretensions, narrowing his circle to a few quiet but genteel families, with whom he had an intimate and most cheerful acquaintance. His heart favored among those households, consisted of Mr. and Mrs. Phipps, their only daughter Sophia, and two maiden sisters of the gentleman who resided with them. They occupied a comfortable old-fashioned house in Temple street, and had come to Bristol but a year before; however, the moment we were introduced—for the Captain made a point of showing us all his friends—my father discovered Phipps to have been a college companion of his, and their old friendship speedily warmed up again. The family in consequence paid us all sorts of polite attentions. They were well meaning, but odd people, every one except Sophia. Mr. Phipps, who held a lucrative appointment in the law, was an excessively pompous but good-humored little man; Mrs. Phipps had been brought up in a farm-house, and kept the dairy about her; the Misses Phipps, commonly called Miss Jane and Miss Sally, were models of antiquated belles, having stopped exactly where modes and manners were when they were twenty, and continued to wear the still precision, high-heeled shoes, and long train. Sophia—she was so called only on great occasions, her ordinary name being Sophy—had just completed her nineteenth year; a fair slender girl somewhat under the middle size, with a faint bloom on her cheeks, smooth nut-brown hair, and a mild but a merry look in her bright blue eyes. Though an only daughter, Sophy was no pet, but her mamma's assistant in all household duties, and expected to do just what her seniors thought best. That expectation Sophy did not seem inclined to disappoint; her natural disposition, or it might be living with so many elderly people, made her more usefully quiet, less rain, and I must say, better liked by her friends, than the generality of pretty girls. Sophy had many distant admirers, but nothing of the kind was encouraged in that house; the Misses Phipps standing out for ultra propriety. I thought my father would have been added to the list—at least, Charles, I was spoiled enough to say so, the first evening he saw her. Scarcely had we gained the street when the good old man opened preliminaries with what a fine girl Sophy Phipps was,—how well she behaved—how wise she looked, and, shute all, how closely she resembled my mother.

It had been a family dinner with the Phipps'. The senior gentlemen lived all their college days over again. Captain Fitzpatrick made himself generally agreeable as usual. I remember how sweetly Sophy sang, and how pleasant was her small chat amid the precise politeness of her aunts and the homely sense of her mother, when I joined the ladies in the drawing-room. My father took an amazing fancy to his college friend's house. The Phipps' had always liked the Captain, and seemed to include us. In short we were there continually, and I was beginning to believe that all my father said about Sophy was true, when the Captain found himself called upon to give a Christmas party. It was in our honor, but much to my father's disappointment, and in some degree to my own, the Phipps' family could not be there. By a long established custom of their house, aunts, uncles, and cousins, to the uttermost bound of relationship, met there at a Christmas dinner; however, the Captain invited all his friends who were not better engaged, and his exertions (not to mention those of his housekeeper) in decorating the mansion with evergreens, and seeking out good things for the dinner, were such as I never saw surpassed in town or country. I helped with all my might; but could not help fearing that the gallant Captain's preparations had something to do with his detention from church on Christmas morning.

The service in Bristol Cathedral was tolerably attended, for the day was fair with faint sunshine, though heavy rain all the previous night had made the old streets muddy. There was a large display of beauty and fashion; and, I regret to say, that for some time the gaily-dressed audience and the quaint decorations of the gothic church, divided my thoughts between them. I saw Sophy Phipps in her usual neat and unnoticeable attire; but the same moment my attention was caught by a lady in the next pew. She was taller and more robust than Sophy, yet would not have been so pretty, but for a brilliant complexion with fine dark eyes and hair. Her dress was richly grave, the newest of furs and velvet; but it was her air of rapt devotion, her fervent responses, and the earnest regard fixed on her gold clasped prayer book, that fascinated me—I fear to the forgetfulness of my own. Never did piety seem so attractive. Compared with her, the rest of the worshippers looked cold, common-place people, and I left the church determined to inquire after the lady's name and history. My father and I had already some acquaintance with whom to exchange the compliments of the season, on our way to the Captain's house—among the rest, Edward Williams, a young man of whom I knew nothing, but that he had been my class-fellow some years before, at King's College, Cambridge, could never get on, some said was plucked, and now visited a widowed aunt in Bristol. Williams bustled up with joy and gratulation, as if I had been the playmate of his childhood, grossed me warmly, introduced himself to my father, and deeply deplored that he had not been sooner made aware of the fact that we were staying with his dear friend, Captain Fitzpatrick. Besides knowing little of him, I never cared for my quondam class-fellow. Williams was known never to be sincere in anything except a continual search after loaves and invitations. However, it appeared the Captain knew his family—a well-descended but ill-doing house they were; and Edward, together with his aunt, were to share that evening's festivity. He was enlarging on this when a much more interesting subject caused his visage.

The laws against street begging were not at this time strictly enforced in Bristol, and as a course, hard by one of the dirtiest crossings, a ragged, wretched-looking man demanded charity, in a tone so loud and importunate that we determined to pass him by as an impostor; scarcely was the passage effected, when I perceived at the opposite side of the street no other than the lady who engaged so much of my mind when it should have been better employed. Her eye was fixed on the ragged man. The crossing was terrible for satin shoes, without which no gentlewoman walked in those days, but she plunged in and over with a crimson purse in her hand, from which I saw her take some coin, and place it in the beggar's fingers with the look of a pitying angel. I watched her over the crossing again and round the corner, and the admiring gaze which Williams sent after her made me think better of him than usual.

"Don't you know her?" he said, in reply to my earnest inquiry, "that is Miss Jennings, the Bath heiress—quite a superior woman, though her father was a tradesman. They say he left her forty thousand in her own right, and she maintains her stepmother, who married a sporting draper after the honest oilman, and was left in difficulties with I don't know how many orphans. Isn't it charming, such benevolence? but you will have an opportunity of making her acquaintance. She has been staying these three weeks with my aunt, who you know patronizes Captain Fitzpatrick's parties. So take care of your heart—" and the flippant young man walked away, followed by my father's angry glance, while I caught sight of the relieved beggar stealing into a gin shop. The Captain had given us a full account of his company, including the Bath heiress and Edward's aunt, a lady some ten years his senior, with whom he had an acquaintance of thirty years' standing, her husband having been a brother officer. The whole had ceraged my memory, but now the details acquired interest. I dressed with more than ordinary precision, as you would, Charles, if about to see Miss Trimmer—and the company assembled, some dozen strong,—old gentlemen, old ladies, but not one under fifty except Miss Jennings, Edward Williams, and myself.

CHAPTER II.

I was solemnly introduced to the heiress, for those were formal times; and, to my inward content, appointed her escort to the dinner table. Miss Jennings' age was my own at least—I never guess ladies' years exactly—her manner was not remarkably courteous, and had a look of being put on. I could not hide this small discovery from myself; but before the adjournment to the drawing-room took place, it was my conviction that the Bath heiress must be a superior woman. Charles, you will believe that it was not the forty thousand that dazzled me—what I had heard and seen of Miss Jennings before our introduction set me a dreaming of all the virtues. Moreover, as our acquaintance progressed, the lady spoke with such confidence on subjects then much above the common level of gentlewomen's education, that I could not help instituting mental comparisons between her and Sophy Phipps, which left no balance in favor of the latter. Sophy might be pretty, and a good girl in her own small way, but compared with Miss Jennings, she was a mere nobody. It was true that in the course of that evening's conversation I more than once perceived that the heiress did not exactly understand what she talked about most volubly. There were queer slips made at times on the high pieces of literature and politics, but then what noble sentiments she expressed at every turn!—how elevated above the purse-pride of an heiress, and the vanities presumed to be of her sex! Indeed, Miss Jennings was severe on these things; but I chiefly admired her expansive benevolence and deep commiseration for the poor.

The old people enjoyed themselves with old stories, songs and chat, Captain Fitzpatrick leading the van. I spent what he called a very grave Christmas, conversing with Miss Jennings, much to the discomfort of Edward's aunt, who had hopes for her nephew in that quarter, but not at all to the displeasure of Edward, who literally did nothing but listen to the heiress with the same admiring look he had cast after her in the street. That appeared to me a remarkable evidence of his good taste, not to say humility; and when the servant arrived with sparerns and patters in good old Bristol fashion, I escorted Miss Jennings home while he walked meekly with his aunt. We talked on grave subjects the whole way, and I should have visited next morning, as the etiquette of my youth required, but Miss Jennings informed me that she "must return to Bath by the early coach—though a single lady, it did not suit her to be long from home;" and with a half sigh, she bade me good-night. For days after, I could think of nothing but Miss Jennings, and, as a natural consequence with men of my mental order, kept a profound silence on the subject, though my father rallied me on being so suddenly captivated, and Captain Fitzpatrick always looked as if he expected something. I didn't care for visiting the Phipps's now—it might be thought I was paying attentions. My sense told me that Sophy was not the girl to think so, but I never passed the threshold without assuming a polite reserve. Though a plain man, my father was an observant one. He saw the turn my mind had taken with some disappointment, not so much that the heir of Oakwood Hall should think of an oilman's heiress, as because he had set his heart on matching me and Sophy. However, he showed both good sense and kindness by sinking the subject entirely, and we went home to celebrate the new year as usual with the tenantry, see the country gentry, and observe my birthday, which happened, as you know, on St. Valentine's eve. It was a gay season with us in Somersetshire, and, though my thoughts were in Bath, or seeking apologies for going thither, I perceived the change of fashions, as young men will, Charles—queens were going out, whitkers were coming in. I lost no time in conforming, and, of course, thought my appearance vastly improved. It certainly was altered. Captain Fitzpatrick, who came to the birthday festivities, did not recognize me at first sight; neither did a distant relative he had brought with him. George Lyttleton had studied with me in Berlin, and taken a world of pleasure when I couldn't muster one; his uncle, who held a government appointment, had given him a capital education, but no profession at all; and at his death, which occurred suddenly in the previous year, his orphan nephew was left an accomplished scholar, without either friends or fortune. Worse subjects might have been found for such luck. Nature had enabled George, even in his youth, to take things easy; as a last resource he had answered an advertisement for a tutor, was accepted, didn't like to go, and, having still some days, was spending them with his only relative, the hospitable Captain.

Knowing his prospects, my father received the young man with extra kindness, and George, according to custom, made himself at home; but Captain Fitzpatrick took the opportunity of our being alone together in the library next forenoon, to ask me if it I knew where Lyttleton was going to teach? "Just in the house with Miss Jennings," he added, without waiting for an answer, "there are two young stepbrothers of here to be tutored. Don't you envy him?"

"Not exactly," said I, endeavoring to look gay; "the nearest is not always the most successful; but Captain, couldn't you help one with an excuse for going to Bath?"

Fitzpatrick's frankness and love of fun, his single hint and boundless good nature, made him the ready confidant of youth, and now that the ice was broken, I made no secret of my admiration of Miss Jennings.

"I knew it," said the Captain, in a musing tone; "some men are caught by fine faces, some by fine clothes, and you, my dear fellow, have been caught by fine talking; bothing is a bad practice, but I'll lay ten to one that girl is either a fool or a vixen, and not to be thought of beside little Sophy Phipps, for all her forty thousand."

My dissent from this opinion was expressed in energetic terms, and Fitzpatrick's eyes twinkled with suppressed laughter, as he said—

"Well, Frank, there is one chance of coming at the truth; go you in George Lyttleton's place; he will let you have it cheap. I'm sure. They haven't seen him yet, and no soul would find you out in that crop."

Here my father stepped in, and Fitzpatrick fell to talking of the Gentleman's Magazine. His proposal had been made in jest, but (would you believe it, Charles) it took possession of my mind. I read novels in those days; and the heir of Oakwood Hall, wooing his bride in the disguise of a penniless tutor, and being loved by the wealthy heiress for himself alone—that was my version of the fundamental—blended no the silliness, and still worse, to the sin of falsehood, involved in such a proceeding. I knew, however, that my father hated deceit, but thought over it till the birthday festivities were done, when I accompanied the Captain and George back to Bristol, being bound to visit my cousin in Gloucestershire, while my father remained at home to look after the planting of young firs. As we rode on, our conversation turned on Lyttleton's tutorship, to which he was now more averse than ever; Lord Westmoreland, his uncle's friend, having written to say he would not forget him, and George couldn't think of receiving a draper's sons after that.

"You should send somebody in your place," said the Captain, with a quizzical look at me; "Frank, here, would make a famous tutor. Wouldn't it be a capital joke?"

"Nothing like it!" said Lyttleton, and part fun, part fully infatuating as all, it was agreed that George should remain with the Captain, at his new house, while I rode to Bath next day with a stock of Latin books, borrowed from Fitzpatrick's friend the surgeon, in the value prepared for my Gloucester journey; and presented myself at No. 9, Brunswick Terrace, as Mr. Lyttleton, the tutor.

No. 9 was a large fashionable house, and when I knocked at its door, in the afternoon of a cautious day, about the end of February, the thought of what my father would say, came suddenly upon me. However, it was too late to turn; George and the Captain would think my heart failed me, besides the door was immediately opened by a coatless footman long by a livery. I boldly gave him my borrowed name and business, and he marshalled me straight up stairs into the back drawing-room. It is marvellous how instinctively one finds out that there is something wrong about a house, almost in the moment of entrance. I suspected, perhaps from the boy's face, that all was not right before my foot was on the first step, and scarce had the drawing-room door closed upon me, when I became conscious that there was somebody scolding powerfully in the next apartment. It was the front drawing-room, and separated from that in which I stood merely by a folding partition. Charles, I could not be accused of overhearing, for nothing but total deafness could have prevented my hearing every word of that oration; but unpoetically as it was, I could not resist the temptation of peeping through a most convenient crevice, for the voice seemed known to me, and there sat Miss Jennings, my mirror of noble sentiments and saint-like benevolence, with fury in her looks, and language I never expected to hear from womankind upon her tongue, scolding at a pale, broken-hearted woman, and two sickly little girls.

At first I thought that some heinous crime had been committed to call forth such indignation; but from the timid remonstrance of the three reduced, and the lady's own admissions, I at length learned that it all arose from a message concerning her being out or in, which the boy had delivered somehow out of order, to a presumed admirer. For that misdemeanor he was to be dismissed—to his knowledge of which my position was probably owing, for at a pause of the storm, he looked in, with a most comical expression of countenance, and said—

"Please, ma'am, I forgot that Mr. Lyttleton, the new tutor, is a sitting in the back drawing-room this hour."

The look of rage which my charmer cast on every body as she darted out after him, would have broken any man's bondage, and I retired from the crevice completely disenchanted. As soon as she could compose herself, Mrs. Meeking, the stepmother, whom I had seen, made her appearance with two large liberly boys and the little girls before-mentioned, who were also to be taught by me, no governess being kept. It was wonderful how well poor Mrs. M. gathered up her spirits, and installed me in the honors of tutorship, the chief of which was to take tea with the family in the back parlor. At that ceremonial Miss Jennings appeared, dressed with surprising taste. I was now quite careless, and on that account better able to play my part, for she did not even suspect me; but I also perceived that the fact of her having overheard her lecture gulped Mr. Lyttleton no favor in her eyes.

This she took no pains to conceal from the poor tutor. In short, I saw the heiress in her true colors, lest, chivalry forbids that I should enter into details; moreover, the causes of her most striking displays were commonly so trifling in themselves, that my narrative would belong entirely to the petty—disagreeable. Suffice it to say, that, within less than three days' residence, I required no further proof that the superior Miss Jennings was vain, capricious, and ill-tempered in no ordinary degree—that her piety was a show, and her benevolence a mere institution—that her benevolence terminated in alms to the most importunate beggar, chiefly because she thought it grand to give money, and if she enabled her stepmother to live in a fashionable house, by paying a large board, there was no peace within it from her ever-changing humors.

Mrs. Meeking had been a gay, thoughtless, little woman, whose spirit was broken, but not instructed, by misfortune. The boys were stupid and slow, the girls puny and peevish; but I played the humble tutor amazingly, and might have supported my character for some time, but as we sat all too on the third evening, a light knock at the hall door announced a visitor. The liveried boy's appearance looked in with a report I could not catch, and Miss Jennings said, in a loud whisper—

"Goodness! It is that old maidish thing, Sophy Phipps—she is growing more like her aunts every day, and so stupid it almost makes me sick; but she must come in, I suppose."

Sophy was shown in accordingly. How pleasant her fair face and bright eyes seemed to me! I was reconciled, dropped hair, whiskers—and all. I knew that by her first glance—but with more good sense and presence of mind than could have been expected at her age, Sophy made no remark, and sat down by the fire, assuring the hospitable Mrs. Meeking that she had drank tea, and her grandmother (with whom it seems she was then staying at Bath) had sent her to ask if Miss Jennings would join them and their friends in getting up a Sunday school for poor children. Such doings were rare in our towns at the time of which I speak, and it astonished me to hear how well and wisely little Sophy spoke on the subject.

"We will all teach in turn," she said, explaining the plan, when Miss Jennings stopped her short with—

"Not I, indeed—I know my rank in life better than to teach dirty children!"

Sophy looked extremely mortified for a minute, and (I know I was wrong, Charles, but the impulse came irresistibly), looking the heiress of forty thousand full in the face, I said slowly and with much deliberation—

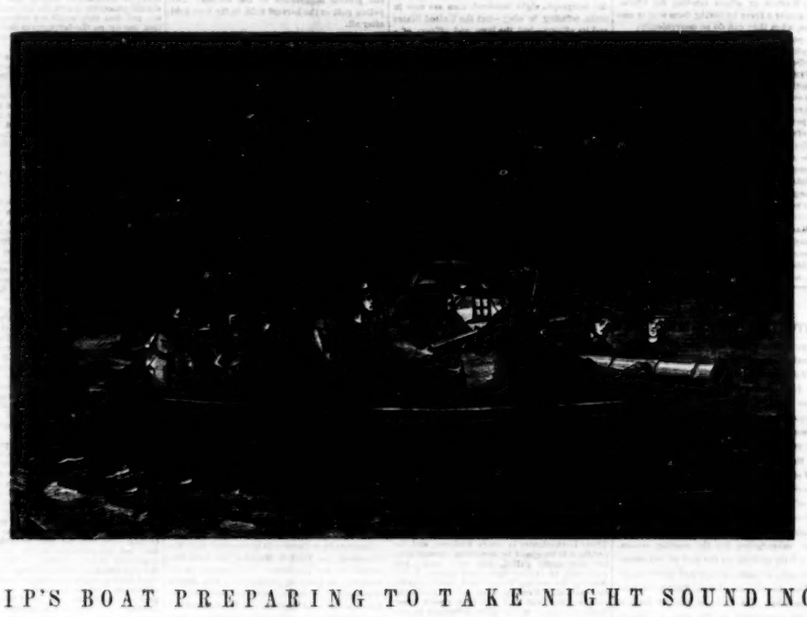
"Madam, the Countess of Huntingdon taught a Sunday school, and I believe your father was an honest oilman."

Miss Jennings stared on me as if her ears had deceived her; the boys gulped their tea louder; Mrs. Meeking and the girls looked as if wondering where they would run, and, losing all courage, I seized my hat, rushed out, and never stopped till at least three squares off. The twilight was soft and calm, and I walked about to arrange my thoughts, till, at the corner of a street, I met Sophy Phipps going quietly home to her grandmother; she informed me that Miss Jennings had gone off into violent hysterics, till her own doctor being called in, prescribed ten drops of red lavender, which restored the heiress sufficiently to declare perpetual war against all tutors in general, and Mr. Littleton in particular. I explained frankly the cause of my disguise, and more than hinted my consequent discomfiture. Sophy said she was afraid Miss Jennings wouldn't be pleased, and we parted in a manner somewhat done. Next morning found me in Bristol; Lord Westmoreland had sent Lyttleton news of a situation, and Captain Fitzpatrick made his new house ring with the laughter at my adventures. He promised—honest man—that he would talk about them as little as possible; but somehow, the story went privately through all Bath and Bristol.

That evening my father laughed nearly as much when I confessed all to him in the library. I remember he tried two or three grave rebukes for deceiving a respectable family, but bushed the matter up when he heard how much Sophy had risen in my estimation, and how sensibly we had talked on the way to her grandmother's. In short, the wedding came off six months after, and there is your aunt Sophy, coming in from her walk to make our tea. Miss Jennings has changed her name long ago to Mrs. Williams, and the last time I saw her, she was leading a gay life in Bath, while his lady had fallen into invalid habits, and he always spoke of her as the old woman. Now, Charles, the moral of my tale is, that I acted like a silly boy in the affair of the Bath heiress; but when one sees a delightful Miss Trimmer, or the like, at ball or party, it is one's wisdom to wait for better acquaintance, and take some more prudent method of seeing the charmer at home.

RUSSIAN MODE OF FILLING TEETH WITH GOLD.—In Russia, according to a recent traveler, recruits are taken first of all to the nearest governmental town. The physician examines each from the sole of the foot to the crown of the head. The boy is healthy and free from blemish. "Open your mouth!" The physician peers in with the searching glance of a treasure seeker. The teeth are without a flaw. The physician is just on the point of giving to the governor the report, "Healthy!" But behold! a half imperial, or ducat, is lying against the double teeth. In a second the practiced medical finger has extracted the gold from the mouth. "No, the fellow is of no use, he has got cartes—all his teeth rattle; within a month he will not have one left." The lad is free! He bounds again into his blouse and his village. The paltry bribe leaves him among his family till the next tribute. But for those golden teeth, the governor would have shouted, "The forehead!" and the recruit have been assigned, in which case his forehead is shaved as clean as his beard, so that he may be recognized if he run away. He stands there like a branded ox in the cattle-market. Nice country, Russia.

Our Picture Gallery.



SHIP'S BOAT PREPARING TO TAKE NIGHT SOUNDINGS.

The above engraving represents a man-of-war's boat preparing to "shove off" for a very important night duty—that of taking soundings and laying down buoys within range of the Russian batteries at Kinburn. "Her Majesty's ships and vessels of war" (as the "Articles of War" have it) are supplied with boats of very various sizes. The large ones alone—like the "launch," &c.—carry guns; and such is the present boat. The men are armed with muskets, pistols, and cutlasses. The officer in command is generally a mate, though, on important occasions, a lieutenant would also be sent. Each boat has its own proper crew, and and its own proper officer. So that let us suppose the launch to be wanted—"Launch's crew to muster," or "Away there, launches!" Down the hatchways the quartermaster rushes off to tell the officer, and everything is soon in active preparation.

To one who has ever lived in a man-of-war, it is not difficult to realize the details by which such a scene as the above is produced. It is a dark night—time about "two bells" (or nine o'clock) in the first watch. The vessel is at anchor, and it has been resolved to send the boat away on duty. The quartermaster finds the officer down in the berth, where a dozen of them are sitting or lounging on the lockers—chatting, reading, or dozing—or sipping the "amber fluid," i. e., rum and water. In comes the gruff head of the quartermaster—"Mr. Jigger, launches called away, sir!" "Never mind your grog, Jigger; I'll finish it;" says the humorous Highlandman. Jigger anticipates him—grows about in the drawer for your clothes he wants, and is seen on deck in cap and great coat. He receives his orders from the commander or first lieutenant (these details depend on the size of the ship), and stands at the gangway as his men rest quickly and quietly down the "accommodation ladder" which the reader sees before him. When they are all ready to glide down the cold water, and betray the secrets of the bay. In a dead stillness the boat makes its way—a darkness gliding through the dark—and when it reaches the desired spot, down goes the lead, the "soundings" are whispered to the officer, who rapidly pencils them in his note-book, and the perilous work goes on. Sometimes, it is so carried on under the very nose of the enemy, and within a few yards of his fortress.

Perhaps a quick eye and a quick ear on the battlements is aware of something wrong. Instantly, the alarm is taken; and shot or shell come whistling through the night air at the boat. On one occasion, as we are informed, a shell burst so near a boat of the Failure, in the Baltic, as to extinguish the lantern, and blow away the officer's papers, yet did no more damage. On such occasions, "give way!" is the order, and the boat shoots down the cold water, and out of the reach of the enemy's guns, and within a few yards of his fortress.

Selected Articles.

THE PRESENT.

Do not stretch to-day and worship
The old Past, whose life is fled.
Much you notice to render service
Crouched he lies, but cold and dead.
For the Present reigns our monarch,
With an added weight of years.
Honor her, for she is mighty!
Honor her, for she is ours!

See the shadows of his heroes
Still around her cloudy throne;
And each day the ranks are strengthened
By great hearts to him unknown;
Noble things the great Past promised,
Made dreams, bold strings and now;
But the Present shall fulfill them,
What he promised, she shall do.

Not in secrets all his treasures,
Not in lore to all is bare;
And the light that lightens round her,
Is the instinct of his name;
So it who with all his wisdom,
Lifting, on his grave, our hands,
Or her know she hears his lessons,
All the heroes in her hands

Crowned, and she rules and conquers
If we then her part do
Let us fight for her as nobly
As our fathers fought for him.
Lord, who crowns the dying age,
Make us calm, and so obey—
Make us meet our green laurels here,
With our living hearts to-day.

A LADY WHO WAS PRESENT AT THE BATTLE OF SARATOGA.—Mrs. Margaret Martin, who is at present stopping at the residence of her grandson, in this city, is ninety-eight years of age. She is one of the few remarkable women of the Revolution, who took part in the memorable occurrences of the struggle for American Independence. Her husband, Gilbert Martin, was a sergeant in the army of Gates, and was engaged in the battle of Saratoga. Mrs. Martin, then a very young woman, was on the field during both struggles constituting this battle, and terminating in the defeat of the splendid army which Burgoyne had transported with such immense labor and expense from Canada, confidently anticipating that he would be able with it to divide the army of the patriots, and secure Sir Henry Clinton in possession of the southern line of defences. Mrs. Martin represents the struggle as most terrific. She says, that towards evening, when Burgoyne, maddened by the consciousness that all his splendid schemes were about to be defeated, directed his whole reserve and cavalry force upon the feeble army of the patriots, the contrabands stood within half musket range of each other, and poured in their deadly volleys, while whole files on either side fell in their tracks, and still neither gave one inch. Towards evening, Mr. Martin was wounded in the shoulder; and while his wife was in the act of affixing a bandage, she herself was wounded in the hand. She says, "Gilbert sprang up like a chafed lion; 'Peggy,' said he, 'I'll go and teach those cowardly dogs better manners than to shoot at a woman'—and I saw him no more till the fight was over."

Of such material were the men and women of the Revolution. We can readily imagine that the field of Saratoga was a strange place for those of the "softer sex." Mrs. Martin, however, has evidently been a woman of uncommon energy of character. He frame still exhibits evidences of strength, and her eye sparkles as she recounts the deeds of that glorious day, or speaks of "that coward Gates, who stayed safe and sound all day in his tent, and cared not for the men who were falling like sheaves in the harvest." One by one the survivors and landmarks of the Revolution are fading away.—Troy Whig.

☞ A man appeared in the streets of Hull, the other day, with his wooden leg painted "Red, White and Blue."

MAN'S DUTY TO WOMAN.

Let him learn to be grateful to woman for this undoubted achievement of her sex, that it is she—she far more than he, and she too often in despite of him—who has kept Christendom from lapsing back into barbarism,—kept mercy and truth from being utterly overborne by those two greedy monsters,—money and war. Let him be grateful for this, that almost every great soul that has led forward or lifted up the race has been furnished for each noble deed, and inspired with each patriotic and holy aspirations, by the retiring footfoots of some Spartan, or more than Spartan—some Christian mother. Manna, the deliverer of his people, drawn out of the Nile by the King's daughter, and one has hinted, is only a symbol of the way that women's better instincts always outwit the tyrannical diplomacy of man. Let him cheerfully remember, that, though the misery and achieve enterprises on public theatres, it is the nerve and sensibility of the other that arm the mind and nerve the soul in secret. "A man discovered America, but a woman equipped the voyage." So everywhere; man executes the performance, but woman trains the man. Every effectual person, bearing his mark on the world is but another Columbus, for whose furnishing some Isabella, in the form of his mother, lays down her jewelry, her comfort, her comfort.

Above all, let not men practice on woman the perpetual and shameful falsehood of pretending admiration and acting contempt. Let them not exhaust their kindness in rebuking her person, and silk in return the humiliation of her soul. Let them not cement to her every opinion, or if she were not strong enough to maintain it against opposition; nor yet manufacture opinion for her, and force it on to her lips by dictation. Let them not crucify her emotions, nor ridicule her frailty, nor crush her individuality, nor insult her dependence, nor play off mean jests upon her honor in convivial companies, nor barely unclean doubts of her, as a wretched substitute for wit; nor whisper vulgar suspicions of her purity, which, as compared with their own, is like the immaculate whiteness of angels. Let them remember that, for the ghastly spectacle of her blasted chastity, they are answerable. Let them multiply her social advantages, enhance her dignity, minister to her intelligence, and by manly gentleness, be the champions of her genius, the friends of her fortunes, and the equals, if they can, of her heart.—Rev. F. D. Huntington.

HOW MONTEZUMA DINED.

[Dr. Doran, in his Table Talk, gives the following interesting account of the magnificence of Montezuma's palace and table, at the time when Cortes invaded Mexico.]

On the terraced roof of his palace, thirty knights could tilt at each other, without complaining of want of space. His armories were filled with weapons almost as destructive as any to be found in any of the arsenals of civilized Christian kings. His granaries were furnished with provisions paid by tributaries; three hundred servants tended the beautiful birds of his aviaries; his menageries were the wonder and terror of beholders; and his dwarfs were more hideous, and his ladies more dazzling, than potentate had ever before looked upon with contempt or admiration. His palace within and without was a marvel of Aztec art. It was surrounded by gardens, glad with fountains, and gay flowers. One thousand ladies shared the retirement of this splendid locality, with a master more glittering than anything by which he was environed,—who changed his apparel four times daily, never putting on again a garment he had once worn, and who, eating off and drinking from gold, (except on state occasions, when his table was covered with services of Cholulan porcelain,) never used a second time the vessels which had once ministered to the indulgence of his appetite.

It is said eulogistically of his cooks, that they had thirty different ways of preparing meat,—a poor boast, perhaps, compared with that of the Parisian chefs, who have six hundred and eighty five ways to dress eggs! Three hundred dishes were daily set before the monarch, and such as were required to be kept hot at table were in heated earthen stands made for the purpose. And it is even asserted, that this universal occasionally killed time before dinner by watching the cooking of his viands, a practice in which, according to Peter Pindar, that honest old English king used to indulge, who dined off boiled muffins at two, and to whom the funniest sight in the world was the clown in the pantomime swallowing coffee.

The ordinary dishes of Montezuma consisted of very dainty fare; namely domestic fowls, geese, partridges, quails, venison, Indian hogs, pigeons, hares, rabbits, and other productions of his country, including—it is alleged by some and denied by others—some very choice dairy-fed baby, when this choice article happens to be in season! In cold weather enormous torches, that flung forth not only light but warmth and aromatic odors, lent additional splendor to the scene; and to temper at once the glare and the heat, screens with deliciously droll devices upon them, framed in gold, were placed before the brilliant flame.

The sovereign sat, like his Saxon, also protected by a screen. He was not so barbarous as our Christian kings of France, who fed in public; nor was he parsonly behind like them by awkward Gargantuas of a middle age. Four Hebes stood by the low throne and table of their master, and these poured water on his hands, and offered him the napkin, white as driven snow, or as the cloth on which the four hundred others stood waiting his reversion. Women as fair presented him with bread; but even those fair ministers retired a few steps, when his sacred majesty addressed himself to the common process of eating. Then a number of ancient but sprightly nobles took their place. With these Montezuma conversed; and, when he was sufficiently pleased with a sign observation or a sprightly remark, a plate of pudding bestowed by the royal hand made one individual happy, and all his fellows bitterly jealous. The pudding, or whatever the dish might be, was eaten in silent reverence; and while an Aztec emperor was at meat, no one in the palace dared, at the peril of his life, speak above his breath. Montezuma is described as being but a moderate eater, but fond of frolic, and indulging, with constraint upon his appetite, in certain drinks which were of a stimulating quality, such as are found in countries where civilization and luxury are at their highest.

"One thing I forgot, and no wonder," says Bernal Diaz, "to mention in its place, and that is, during the time Montezuma was at dinner, two very beautiful women were busily employed making small cakes, with eggs and other things mixed therein. These were delicately white, and when made, they presented them to him on plates covered with napkins. Also, another kind of bread was brought to him on long leaves, and plates of cakes resembling wafers. After he had dined, they presented to him three little canes, lightly ornamented, containing liquid amber

THE

SATURDAY EVENING POST

ESTABLISHED AUGUST 4, 1821.

WEEKLY EDITION, BETWEEN 80,000 AND 90,000.

In leaving their Prospectus for 1856, the proprietors of the Post take it for granted, that the public are already tolerably well acquainted with the character of a paper that has grown strong during the storms and sunshine of THIRTY-FOUR YEARS. Their endeavor will be, as it has been in the past, to make it a moral family paper for the family circle, which shall not only amuse and interest, but shall also be a source of pleasure and profit. To accomplish this object, the best articles are selected or condensed from foreign and domestic periodicals, and original articles of an instructive character are procured, when possible.

Letters from Foreign Lands; the most interesting portions of the Weekly News of the World; Tales of Life, Adventure and Character; Selected and Original Articles upon Agriculture; Account of the Produce and Stock Markets, and the receipts of Bank Note Lists, for the information of business men, are some of the features in the contents found in the Post.

But the mind requires a wider range—it has faculties which delight in the humorous and lively, the tragic and pathetic. These faculties also must have their appropriate food, else they become enfeebled, and, as a consequence, the intellect becomes narrow and one-sided; and to use also to take an enlarged and generous view of human affairs and duties. To furnish these faculties with their appropriate food, we devote a fair proportion of the Post to FICTION, POETRY and HUMOR.

Among our contributors in the first two of the above departments, are several of the most gifted writers in the land. We also draw freely for Fiction and Poetry upon the best productions of the English Periodicals, including a New Story by Miss Bremer, author of "The Parsonage of Tedefors," "Strife and Peace," "The Neighbors," &c.

A DEPARTMENT, DEVOTED TO SHORT PAPERS, on Agriculture and Rural Affairs, and a few Essays, with others of a Humorous, though refined character, are also freely given.

The Postage on the Post, to any part of the United States, paid quarterly or yearly in advance, at the office where it is received, is 18 cents a year.

TERMS—CASH IN ADVANCE.

7 copies,	$6 00 a year.
8 " (and one to getter-up of Club,)	7 50 "
9 " (and one to getter-up of Club,)	10 00 "
13 copies, (And 1 to getter-up of Club,)	$15 00 a year.
20 " (And 1 to getter-up of Club,)	20 00 "

Address, always post-paid,

DEACON & PETERSON,

No. 66 South Third Street, Philadelphia.

☞ SAMPLE NUMBERS sent gratis to any one, when requested.

☞ We insert a few Notices of the Post from its Exchanges:

This is one of the few large papers filled with life and thought, instead of lumbering trash. Its management is marked by liberality, courtesy, shrewdness and tact. It employs the best literary talent, and spares no pains or expense.—As a family paper, one of literary and general intelligence, we cordially commend it.—Cayuga Chief, Auburn, N. Y.

In another column is an advertisement of the Saturday Evening Post. Our readers may rely upon it, that Deacon and Peterson will be as good as their word. In the do we can judge by years of differentiation, these publishers do rather more than they promise, and their paper is edited with very marked ability. It is singularly free from silly sentimentalism and bloater, but is yet a lively time on all topics, always moderate in tone, but always ready advocating the right. We find it one of the most generally attractive papers in our exchanges.—Saturday Visitor, Pittsburg, Pa.

It is decidedly one of the very best literary newspapers in the whole country, and merits its unparalleled success with which it has met under its present enlightened and liberal proprietorship. The greater the distribution in this State, the best, probably, to elevate its tone generally, yet we need prominence it's most exceptional talent, and worthy of the patronage of everybody. The contributors to the Post are among the finest writers in America, and the editor's articles are always characterized by truth and taste.—Jersey Blue, Camden, N. J.

We regard it as the best of the Philadelphia literary papers. Its editorials are written with ability, and also a comprehensive view of whatever is discussed.—Echo, Jeffersonville, Pa.

The editorial department is conducted with ability and skill, and the news department, for a weekly paper, is exceedingly full and complete. All things considered, the Post is not excelled, for family reading, by any paper that we know of.—Gazette, Dallas, New York.

☞ TO EDITORS.—Editors who give the above one insertion, or condense the material portions of it, (including our terms,) for their editorial columns, shall be entitled to an exchange, by sending us a marked copy of the paper containing the advertisement or notice.

Clippings.

☞ Breathes there a man with soul so dead, who never to himself hath said, I will a family paper take, both for my own and children's sake! If such there be, let him repent, and ask us this paper to him sent.

☞ A young man in Chicopee, while attempting to kiss a young lady, slipped and fell, losing his kiss and two front teeth. Poor fellow! And what a disappointment to the young lady.

☞ The Vineyard Gazette says that an Irish girl living in that village, who was in the habit of soaping the dirty clothes before putting them to soak, on being told by her mistress to get a dried codfish and put it to soak for dinner, did so, after rubbing it over smartly with a good quantity of soft soap.

☞ Nothing can make man whose regard for personal comfort is paramount to his sense of national honor and the importance of the Arctic researches upon commercial affairs, says, "After all, the grand achievement of Dr. Kane was in finding a place where mosquitoes have never been."

☞ Nobility and gentleness go hand in hand; and when I see a young gentleman kind to his mother, and gentle and forbearing to his brothers and sisters, I think he has a noble heart.

☞ The Gazette de Mediaine says that nostalgia, or home-sickness, is one of the main predisposing causes of the great mortality of the sick-time in the Crimea among the allied troops.

☞ Piety is not an end, but a means, through the purest repose of the spirit, to attain the highest culture. Wherefore it may be remarked, that those who pursue piety as an end and aim, are mostly hypocrites.

☞ PUNCH'S DEFINITION OF THE ENGLISH SYSTEM.—Every General ought to be able to look death in the face. What, then, more reasonable than to select for Generals veterans who are at death's door!

☞ RETROSPECT EXPLAINED.—Venus's son was drawn by doves. Intimating thereby that in love there should be no kicking over the traces.

☞ At a marriage ceremony, celebrated in a M. E. Church in Baltimore, on Tuesday, the bride was dressed in snow white satin, the first time she ever appeared in deep blue, and the second in red silk.

☞ SOME OUT IN MINTS'.—Little boy—Ma, will that woman go to Heaven any sooner than you, 'cause she's got a pew all to herself?

☞ Hambolt says that tobacco in the Indian weed for the pipe through which the weed is smoked.

☞ ARMORER OF SARAGAS.—Neither high nor humble was at any time spared by his offensive wit. Meeting the Prince of Wales and the Duke of York one day in St. James' street, as he was leaving the portico, "We've just been discussing Sherry," said the Duke, "whether you are a vapor or a fog." "I am between both, your Royal Highness, he replied, taking an arm of each before passing on.

☞ A SAFE RULE.—When a young man confidently tells you that such and such a young lady "has no heart," you may be sure that he has been trying it on, and has failed in making an impression.—Punch.

☞ How does it happen that the most superficial orators generally make the longest speeches? The answer to this question (which is not a conundrum) appears to be that "those gentlemen endeavor to give their orations in length that which they want in depth."

☞ A red-headed lover, in writing to a red-headed girl, should use great care in wooding his helpmate. The term said about "mutual house," the better. We once knew a wedding postponed six years by a similar phrase to this.

☞ Dean Swift once visited the neighborhood where some ten years before, a very great man had lived and died. For a long time he could find no one who remembered the departed. But after inquiry he met an old gentleman, the pastor of the church, who said to the inquiry, "Yes, I think I do, yes, I now recall him, he had a little dog whose ears were cut off close to his head." So it is, our very dogs will be remembered when we are forgotten.

☞ It is said that advertisements like the following, taken from a late London journal, are frequent in the London newspapers:—"Original Manuscript Sermons.—The widow of a clergyman is willing to dispose of the manuscript of her husband's Discourses, which are sound and practical, and adapted to any class of hearers. Add rose 'Clarissa,' Blockingley Belgrade, Surrey."

☞ Breakfast Bonbons.—By Dr. Wilson. Published by Mason, Sutton & Mulligan, New York and Auburn. For sale by T. B. Peterson, Philadelphia.

☞ A Treatise on English Pronunciation. By John Walker. Fifty-fifth edition. Published by Crosby, Nichols & Co., Boston. For sale by T. B. Peterson, Philadelphia.

☞ Rhymes and Stories. By Mrs. Hamilton. Published by Mason, Sutton & Mulligan, New York and Auburn. For sale by T. B. Peterson, Philadelphia.

☞ Lessons in Mental Arithmetic. By Rev. Thomas Hunt. Published by Crosby, Nichols & Co., Boston. For sale by T. B. Peterson, Philadelphia.

☞ Brothers Manor, the Circuit Rider, or, Ten Years Wesleyan Preacher. Published by B. B. Mussey, 1854 Washington, Cincinnati.

☞ Man of Sin Lost. A Sermon Supplemental to the Second Sermon, during a voyage around the world in a ship of the line. Published by Mason, Stereotype, Sup & Co., Cincinnati, and J. P. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia.

☞ A Guide to Horticulture in the United States. By Jacob Bonner. New York: Harper & Brothers.

Just the thing that was wanted. Get up uniform with Dickens' Child's History of England, and written in a very successful imitation of his style. For those objecting to that imitation, we think the book will be more acceptable upon this account. For sale by Lindsay & Blakiston, Philadelphia.

New Publications.

The following new works are on our table:—

Discourses of St. Bernard. Collected from the Memorials of Les Cassis, Clairvaux, Menthelon, &c. By Rev. S. J. Allen, D. D. Published by Gould & Lincoln, Boston. A very interesting work—by a hearty religist of the great organic. Published by Harper & Brothers. New York and for sale by Lindsay & Blakiston, Philadelphia.

Roberts' Classical Library. Cicero's Orations on the Gallic and Civil Wars. Cicero's Three Books of Offices or Moral Duties. Xenophon's Anabasis, or Expedition of Cyrus, and the Memorabilia of Socrates. Literally translated. Published by Harper and Brothers. And for sale by Lindsay & Blakiston, Philadelphia.

An Outline of the General Principles of Grammar. Edited and enlarged by the Rev. Guard Barron, A. M. Published by Harper & Brothers, New York. For sale by Lindsay & Blakiston, Philadelphia.

The Vicar Among the Mad Men. Or, Notes from the Diary of a Special Agent of the Post Office Department. By J. Holbrook. Well illustrated. An opportunity well written and amusing work from which we shall probably make an extract—then for the benefit of the community. Published by H. Cowperthwait & Co., Philadelphia.

Carrie Hamilton; Or, The Heiress of Twin Springs. By Mrs. C. W. Denison. Published by the American Baptist Publication Society, Philadelphia.

The Cross of Christ. By Mr. Spurgeon. An other edition of this fascinating work. Published by T. B. Peterson, Philadelphia.

Pennsylvania Farm Journal. We are requested to state that this periodical hereafter will be edited by D. A. Wells, A. M., and A. M. Spangler.

The Kansas Region. By Max Greene. A variety of interesting particulars as to the soil, climate, &c., of Kansas. It is dedicated to Reynal Taylor. Published by Porter & Weiss, New York.

Footsa Barong. Its Unjust Necessity and Practicability. By Flory Mace. A good work in a good work. Published by Stringer & Townsend, N. Y. Price 50 cts.

The Powers of Selection. A Class Book. By Caroline Lee Hentz. There are not more selections, as some might suppose, but original productions, designed for instructing young ladies in school. Published by Charles Desilver, Philadelphia.

The Wreath and Other Poems. By Philip James Bailey, author of Festus. A new edition of poems by Philip Bailey, embracing the usual number of Sonnets, &c., miscellaneous, and hard words. Published by Ticknor & Fields, Boston, and for sale by T. B. Peterson, Philadelphia.

Bible Manifestations. By Robert Hare, M. D. Professor of Chemistry in the University of Pennsylvania. Published by Charles Scribner, Nassau, New York, and for sale by Samuel Harry, 121 Arch Street, Philadelphia, who keeps on hand an assortment of publications devoted to this subject.

Hopkins' Magic Exercises. By Graham. From the sixth London Edition. Published by J. W. Moore, Philadelphia.

Ada Lee, Or, Without and Within. By the author of "Our Parish." Published by Brown, Bazin & Co., Boston. For sale by T. B. Peterson, Philadelphia.

Lost Hebrew, Or, The Antediluvians of an Orphan Girl. By Alice Gray. Published by H. Long & Brother, New York. For sale by T. B. Peterson, Philadelphia.

☞ We have received from the Publisher, Lippincott, Grambo & Co., Philadelphia, the following, which we shall notice more at leisure:

Lectures on English Pronunciation. By John Walker. Fifty-fifth edition. Published by Crosby, Nichols & Co., Boston. For sale by T. B. Peterson, Philadelphia.

Brother Manor, the Circuit Rider, Or, Ten Years Wesleyan Preacher. Published by B. B. Mussey, 1854 Washington, Cincinnati.

Man of Sin Lost. A Sermon Supplemental to the Second Sermon, during a voyage around the world in a ship of the line. Published by Mason, Stereotype, Sup & Co., Cincinnati, and J. P. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia.

SATURDAY EVENING POST.

HENRY PETERSON, EDITOR.

PHILADELPHIA:

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1855.

ALL THE CONTENTS OF THIS POST ARE STRICTLY WITHIN THE LAW, AND AT ANY TIME MAY BE PERUSED BY ANY OF A DIFFERENT SEX.

TERMS, &c.

The price of the Post are $2, if paid in advance—$2, if not paid in advance. For $5, in advance, one copy is sent three years. We undertake the following, for terms to Clubs, to be filled in the city to one address, and in the country to one Post Office:

4 Copies,	$5.00 Per Annum.
8 " (and one to the getter up of the Club,)	10.00
15 " (and one to the getter up of the Club,)	15.00
20 " (and one to the getter up of the Club,)	20.00

Persons residing in British North America must much money for rent in addition to the subscription price, as we have to prepay the United States postage.

Answers to Clubs.—Any person having sent the money and names for a Club, may add a name to it at the same rate, provided the latter will allow their subscriptions to end at the same time there of the main list do. We will willingly supply the back numbers if we have them. Our object is to have all the subscriptions in each Club end at the same time, and thus prevent confusion.

The Money for Clubs must always be sent in advance. When the sum is large, a draft should be procured, if possible—the cost of which may be deducted from the amount.

Post-Masters or others sending for Clubs, would confer a favor by having them sent to one address, when they can do so conveniently.

The papers in Clubs are invariably stopped at the expiration of the period for which they have subscribed.

A New Post-office.—Our subscribers will take notice that we now have an authorized agents out of this State. They will (hereafter) please remit to us direct.

All persons obtaining letters to us should be careful to give the name of the State, as well as of the town, to which they live. All letters must be post-paid.

Subscribers wishing their paper changed, will please give the name of the Post-Office to be changed from, as well as the Post-Office they wish it hereafter sent to.

We trust that each of our old friends, the Post-Masters, so far not feel indisposed to take advantage of our liberal offer themselves, will show our Prospectus to other influential and respectable persons who will be willing to raise Clubs, &c.

VIVIA:

A STORY OF LIFE'S MYSTERY.

In accordance with the new arrangement, we design commencing this story by Mrs. Southworth, author of "The Deserted Wife," "The Lost Heiress," &c., in the first paper of January next.

It would be quite an accomodation to us, if persons getting up clubs for the new year, would send them in as early as possible, in order that we might be able to regulate the size of our edition. In view of the again prosperous condition of the country, and the small price of a paper like the Post, as compared with the high price of almost everything else, we think we ought to receive a liberal increase of our subscription list the coming season. With a little activity on the part of our numerous friends, at least ten thousand names might be added to our circulation during the next three months. Not that our present list is at all to be complained of, but that we like to keep Moving On, Moving On!

A NOVELET FROM MRS. HENTZ.

Our readers will be pleased to learn that we have made an arrangement with Mrs. Caroline Lee Hentz, author of "Marcus Warland," "Linda," "The Planter's Northern Bride," &c., for an original Novelet from her talented and popular pen, which we design laying before them at the close of Mrs. Southworth's novelet.

THE IRISH CONVENTION.

Just in season to give some color to the statement of the London Times that an invasion of Ireland was menaced from the United States, comes the Convention in Cincinnati, where Irish proceedings are described in another column. This Convention professed to represent a large number of persons in fourteen states, and doubtless will be seized upon as a precious morsel by some of the English journals. And in truth it will be difficult to convince the people of Great Britain, that such high sounding doings as distinguished the meeting in question, are really of no practical moment whatever, except so far as they may affect the actors themselves.

The main business of the Convention may be characterized as the manufacture of "bulls." For instance, they declared their intention so to organize an armed invasion of the territory of a nation with whom the United States are at peace. In order to please both Catholic and Protestant, they say:—

Let us assure the clergy of that faith to which the large majority of the Irish people subscribe, that instead of being the beggars of favor from England, as they are now, under an Irish Republic their spiritual influence will be sought for more deeply in the hearts of their people; they will be in a position to exercise to the fullest their spiritual powers—unhampered by unjust laws of a persecuting public opinion; so also will the same rights and privileges be extended to the clergy of every religious denomination.

This reminds us of the orator who declared that the people should be willing to forfeit all their rights to preserve the rest. The Catholic clergy are promised all the platter to themselves, and every other church to have the same privilege. But how little the former desire such aid, is shown by the fact that they almost universally denounce the movement.

But as a proof of the absurd character of the whole affair, it contemplates the "emancipation" of those who consider themselves free, and simply beg to be let alone—and to take advantage of a war, which has no better adventures in the British realm than in Ireland itself. We cannot wonder at a somewhat sensible man, like Gen. Shields, writing of this matter in the following not very complimentary language:—"If there is one man in America, who thinks I am such a fool as to countenance such absurdity, he may cherish that belief. . . If my name be mentioned publicly in connection with it, you will do me the favor to contradict it."

As we said, instead of hurting the "Saxon," these gentlemen will more probably simply hurt themselves. What are we to think of such language as the following, addressed to "the Irish in the British Colonies and elsewhere?"

Under whatever flag they find shelter, or however prosperous their lot may be, their address forms in the secret feelings of old Ireland, beside her historic rivers, and under the shadow of her ancient pillar towers and cathedrals. The ashes of their kindred have hallowed the soil—it is the consecrated ground in which their own bones should be laid.

If this mean anything, it means that the "natural home" of Irishmen, wherever they may temporarily sojourn, must always be in Ireland—that America may be their residence, but cannot be their home. And if not their home, they will not act so much for her advantage, or with regard to the interests of the land from which they have wandered, and which they still consider as "consecrated ground." For our part, we are very free to say, that the foreigner who will not or cannot adopt the United States as his future home—throwing off all expectation or even desire of returning to the country in which he was born—making thus the interest of his adopted country the paramount consideration—has no claim to be admitted to the privileges of American citizenship, neither can he in good conscience assume the obligations which such citizenship imposes. If these gentlemen really mean what they say—if what we have quoted be anything more than a pretty poetical flourish—they should at once, in all honor and conscience, tear up their naturalization papers, and decline any further political identification with this country. But in charity to them, we prefer to believe that they are not in earnest, and that they really do not mean what they say.

☞ Mr. Augustine Duganne, the well-known writer, has been chosen to the legislature of New York by the largest vote ever cast in his district.

TROUBLE IN KANSAS.

The "Squatter Sovereignty" doctrine seems to be rapidly obtaining its natural growth in Kansas. Throw a State or large or Territories into the ocean, to be managed for themselves, and the result is all probable they will do just that. The minority, after trying the ballot box, will indignantly resort to the cartridge box.

The true "popular sovereignty" of the territory belonging to the Union, is, or we have hitherto held, in the people of the whole United States. And they have not the ability to divest themselves of it—for even "squatter sovereignty" cannot, can only be established by the true popular sovereignty of the people of the whole Union, as represented in Congress. But true popular sovereignty acts a secondary part, when it endeavors to throw off its obligations to a common duty, and leaves the institution of a new State to be determined by the first rude and generally merely temporary users of emigration.

Common sense, in its duty without regard to sectional interests—but simply with the view of establishing in all new and virgin territory, the best, the most institutions which the people of mankind has developed. If the institutions of slave-side were, in the belief of Congress, superior to the institution of the other thirty, the representatives of those thirty would have a right to insist upon the principle, and instead upon the new State which they were founding—not institutions similar to their own—but institutions similar to that one. We have express no opinion as to the different forms of society which prevail in the United States, but we cannot understand how any sensible, unprejudiced man can deny the principle of action which we have laid down.—That Congress is bound, in founding a new State, to inaugurate the most perfect, practicable institutions with which the progress of the race has made mankind acquainted.

But Congress has neglected its duty—and instead of sending a Territory to Utah, to be a settlement as comes from border connection and strife. The result is—that, according to the telegraph, eight hundred men are now in arms, refusing to obey—not the United States and its officers—but the laws and officers of a legislature which they assert does not represent the great majority of the people of the Territory. To be consistent, they cut the "Squatter Sovereignty" doctrine to its logical results, the United States now should not interfere, except so far as to keep of the Indians of the adjoining States of Missouri and Iowa, but let the people of Kansas, and, rather than a repetition of Utah, let them, if they have the power, make a new State, with which the United States must treat, or be at war with it.

We cannot wonder at the most popular public journals in the United States, combining, as it does, in a literary point of view, all the interest of the best magazine, with a vast amount of general intelligence.—Republican, Lewisfield, Ct.

The long period during which this sterling paper has been established, and its recent immense circulation, (being between 80,000 and 90,000,) are ample guarantees to all who desire an excellent paper, that they will get the worth of their money by subscribing for the Post.—Clarion, Leader, Dover, Pa.

This is one of the best family papers upon our exchange list. Its original and well selected matter is of the first order.—North-Western Democrat, Minneapolis, Min. Ter.

We have heretofore spoken in high terms of the merits of the Post, as one of the best papers on our exchange list, and we regard it as one of the best literary papers to be found anywhere. Its editorials are written with ability, and take a liberal, independent, and comprehensive view of men and things.—State and Adv., Wrightsville, Pa.

This is one of the oldest weekly papers in Philadelphia. It has lived on through all weathers—adversity has tested it, and prosperity lifted its sails—and yet it is the same staunch, strong barque.—Spectator, Greenville, Ill.

We are in weekly receipt of this invaluable family journal, and should feel very much at a loss without it, as we consider it the best literary paper now published, of its class, in the Union, without any exception.—Democrat, Cambridge, Md.

THE CITY AND COUNTRY PRESS.—OUR neighbor, "The Village Record," published in West Chester, says:—

In many northern newspapers are now alleged to be published upon the community, things which it is contended it is treason not to impound upon. Every day brings out a prospectus heralding some new paper, promising upon their face to blast, and blight, and wither all things to cure the body politic of inherent evils. There is charlatanry in every business, and the public is imaginary, and its ignorance and credulities are very easily gulled, and ever ready, like gudgeons, to swallow that which is new. * * * Among the many journals and periodicals, such as Saturday Evening Post, of Philadelphia, stands at the head, and has been always deservedly popular. We are always friendly to promoting the circulation of well conducted foreign papers; they in no wise supercede the local papers, but by encouraging an appetite for reading, create a demand for them. Scarcely no intelligent man expects his own local or county paper to be presented at the same price as a distant or city paper. In the very nature of things that is impossible.

The "Village Record" is an old, popular and influential press, and we are pleased to have its testimony as to the fact that the city papers really create a demand for the local ones. It has always seemed to us that this must be the case, especially when the local papers are properly conducted. The Post is the Record, as in other well managed country papers, a large amount of local news; and we think it is by the industrious collection of such news, and by making themselves the vehicles for the political, social, and business interests of their neighborhoods, that they render themselves absolutely indispensable to the districts in which they are located. And then again, it is undeniably true that the appetite for information grows with what it feeds on; and that the man who takes one paper is more apt to take another, than his unreading neighbor is to take one.

A Hasty Proceeding.—We are pleased to hear from Washington, that the recognition of the Walker government of Nicaragua, by Mr. Wheeler, has been disapproved of by the Administration. We hope that the endorsement from this country, the hurried recognition of his success by Mr. Wheeler, is calculated to expose the United States to jealous animadversions, if not to just suspicion. Nothing can be truer than that it is the policy of this government to acknowledge the powers that be in all foreign governments, without regard to the justice of the claim by which they hold the supreme authority—but in all cases, and especially in a case like the present, for the reason we have above given, should sufficient time be allowed to elapse, to test the probable permanency of a revolutionary government.

It appears that the trade with Central America, that there was a strong disposition manifested in the other States to unite against Walker. It cannot be wondered at that late events have promoted the growth of a natural jealousy of foreign intervention. And if this feeling be not strong enough to unite the Central American States in a government sufficiently powerful to hold in contempt the filibustering attacks of a few hundred Americans, we confess we see little hope for such a people. We may pity, but we power on earth can easily help a race, so destitute of the good sense and ability to help themselves.

Minnesota.—We see it stated in the "Minnesota Times," that Dr. J. B. Phillips, of Chester County, Penn., whose resemblance to Martini recently got him into difficulties in Switzerland, has purchased 5,000 acres in the Cottage Grove District, near St. Paul, for $25,000. Dr. Phillips thinks that Real Estate rules lower by 25 to 50 per cent. in and about St. Paul than in any town he has visited of like character and prospects west of the Alleghany Mountains. It might be well, therefore, for emigrants "Westward ho" to give the place a look.

By the way, one gentleman of our acquaintance, after spending a year or two in California, and then travelling through the West on a tour of examination, has quietly gone back to the old homestead in Chester County. Taking society and other things into consideration, he prefers the East. So our Western friends must not think they are to be allowed to run over the course without opposition.

The Paste Diamonds.—It is said that many of the snuff-boxes given away by titled personages, are ornamented with imitation diamonds, and not the real article.—Mehemet Ali, Pacha of Egypt, being the discoverer of this adroit mode of reconciling the munificence of a prince, with the exigencies of an embarrassed exchequer. As a number of such articles have been bestowed upon American citizens in recent years, would it not be well for them to institute an examination into the quality of the royal gifts which they so highly value? To be sure, you "should not look the gift horse in the mouth," as a general thing, but in this case it may be considered excusable. What are they, gentlemen—like the monarchs themselves, mere paste, or the true, insulated royal brilliants?

The Keystone Associates of Louisiana.—We are pleased to learn that the natives of Pennsylvania and their descendants, now residing in Louisiana, have formed themselves into an association with the above title, to keep up their love for the old mother commonwealth. Applications for membership may be addressed to the Secretary, Mr. E. C. Hancock, 22 Camp street, New Orleans. Dr. B. Mills is President of the Society. It has our best wishes for a long and useful life.

Laudable Usage Abroad.—The yearly expense of maintaining our twelve military posts and two thousand men in New Mexico, is said to be about one and a half millions of dollars, or seven hundred and fifty dollars per man.

GOLD AND GRAIN.

The following statistics, will be found to show a marvelous growth, and are worth preserving:—

The Gold in the United States produce from the commencement of the year 1848 to the end of the year 1854 inclusive,	$[illegible]
Gold in California in the year 1849 to the end of the year 1854 inclusive,	[illegible]
Gold in the United States produce in the year 1854,	[illegible]
Gold in California in the year 1854,	[illegible]
Total,	[illegible]
Gold in the year 1855 to the 1st of July,	[illegible]
Total estimate of harvest of 1855—
Wheat,	[illegible]
Corn,	[illegible]
Oats,	[illegible]
Rye,	[illegible]
Barley,	[illegible]
Buckwheat,	[illegible]
Potatoes,	[illegible]
Hay, tons,	[illegible]
Total,	[illegible]
Left in the country,	[illegible]

FROM KANSAS.

The Kansas Free-State papers and correspondents give the following account of the difficulties in the Northern, differing very materially from the accounts of the Pro-Slavery papers:

Fifty-eight of the Free-State prisoners, taken at Hickory Point, a place about 15 miles south of Lawrence, were released on their parole of honor. Out of these, a Mr. Coleman, "a prisoner, rather" he now holds, and said that he had been treated very kindly by the Pro-Slavery men, some disturbing between the Pro-Slavery and Free-State men, which he had seen, he thought, had a chance near Lecompton, and which he had a chance near Lecompton, and which he had a chance near Lecompton, and one of two of the Free-State men, who had been burned in Hamilton on Dow's land, cutting the timber therefrom. This, of course, grew offensive, and Dow prohibited them cutting the timber. It appears, however, that they had been in the habit of cutting it on Dow's land. On last Thursday Mr. Dow had gone to the Shawnee Mission, which is near Coleman's residence, and while there met with Coleman and four of his friends. One of them drew a rifle on him, and threatened to shoot him, but Coleman, fearing that some of Dow's friends would be injured by one, Mr. Dow started to leave, and, get away a few rods, when the gentleman fired upon him, and he fell, he thinks, in consequence of a percussion cap. Looking around, he received a charge of lead shot in his bottom from Coleman, and fell dead upon the spot. Coleman immediately fled.

A meeting of citizens held on the spot where the affair occurred to inquire into the case, pronounced it a cold-blooded murder on the part of Coleman, and charged four men, named Hages, Bulkley, Moody and Wagner, with being accomplices. A warrant for their arrest was passed, and a Committee appointed to investigate still further, to search out the offenders, and to report back to the meeting for justice. Sheriff Jones with a posse of fourteen men, arrested Brunson, at whose house Dow died, for the murder of Dow, and was on his way to carry to keep the peace, but while proceeding to Lecompton, Brunson was rescued by an equal party of his neighbors. Jones sent to Fort Leavenworth, and Colonel Sumner, the Governor had assured him the assistance of 10,000 men if required.

Dr. Jarvis, from Ohio.—The accounts from Kansas state that 850 men, armed with Sharpe's rifles, had assembled at Lawrence. They have declared themselves willing that the Sheriff should peaceably search for the escaped prisoners, and that they would not commence hostilities, but act on the defensive to the last. Footmen, who had come out from his capture, in now in Lawrence.

It is said that the prisoners, who have been at least of the Kansas Free-State party, have 500 men in Lawrence, and are in a complete and fortified state. Action is not free in the North, when in opposition to the laws, whether should be, but it is quite evident that in order that those who think certain laws unjust or oppressive, may have an opportunity of trying to convince the people that such laws ought to be repealed, Jefferson said, "Error of opinion may be safely tolerated, if reason is left free to combat it." And Milton said, and with deep philosophy too—"Give me the liberty to know, to utter and to argue freely, according to my conscience"—above all other liberties." In truth, liberty of speech and liberty of the press, lie at the foundation of all liberties—and no nation is really free, whatever it may think or say, without them.

The Late Outrages.—The recent Concordat between the Pope and the Austrian government admits that rule of the church to an extent we believe never before tolerated. The Bishops may divide livings, prohibit dangerous books, and confer religious instruction in the public and private schools. No one may touch theology without their permission. Clerical matters are withdrawn from civil control—and the Bishops have full right to punish the clergy who may offend against the Church. No sale of church property can take place without the consent of the Church. In Russia, Poland and every barrier against ecclesiastical encroachment seems to have been deliberately set aside, without complaint, and either from motives of policy, or by the mere force of superstition. Austria thus presents—unless the whole matter is grossly misrepresented—a singular contrast to France, Spain and Sardinia.

Important if True.—It is reported that Mr. Crampton, the English Minister, has been dismissed by the President. The announcement however, is not made officially. The British Ministry, it is stated, have not positively refused to make an apology for Mr. Crampton's course—but have presented an argument upon the question, designed to gain time, and thus defer the evil day in the hope that something may turn up. We think John Bull would show his wisdom by apologizing for the conduct of his agents in the most courteous, free and unembarrassed manner. There is nothing like a profound bow and a fine flow of words to cover a retreat from a blunder. If properly done, it almost makes the accusing party ashamed of himself, as if he had taken up a tribe too warmly. We wonder at Lord Palmerston—we thought that if he had any good quality in the world, it was Tact.

More's New Map.—We have been shown one of Moore's large new maps, and are well pleased with it. It represents a surface of nearly nine millions of square miles, including, besides the United States from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the Canadas, Mexico, the Central American States, Cuba, Gulf of Mexico, &c. The six proposed routes for a railroad to the Pacific are also given. There is likewise a map of the whole world, on a smaller scale, in which the American Continent is displayed so as to show its capabilities for being the carrier of the commerce between Eastern Asia and Western Europe. The work will be sold by subscription, and the public duly called upon. See advertisement.

Death of Mr. Simmons.—Mr. A. H. Simmons, one of the proprietors of the Public Ledger, of this city, departed this life on Sunday morning last. He was 45 years of age, and had been connected with the Ledger since its small beginning in 1836. He lived long enough to see an enterprise to which he had devoted much energy and industry, fully and lucratively established. We were not personally acquainted with Mr. Simmons, but he was universally esteemed as a man of warm heart and scrupulous integrity.

Our Imports and Exports.—According to the forthcoming report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the imports for the year ending June 30, 1855, were $261,468,520—while our exports were $275,156,846; being an excess of exports of over thirteen millions. Of the exports, over twenty-eight millions were of foreign production. Such an excess of exports is a very favorable indication. More than half the exports, and three-fourths of the imports, are credited to New York and Massachusetts.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.—We have received the first number of this new periodical. It is embellished with well engraved portraits of "The Arctic Explorers," a picture of the "Kansas Constitutional Convention," &c.

General News.

A London Fog.—Few persons can form any idea of the density of a London fog, from what they occasionally see in this country. On the 15th and 16th of November a dense fog prevailed in London and its vicinity, during which steamboats and omnibuses ceased to run, hacks and cabs got on the side walks, numbers of persons walked over the wharves into the Thames, and were drowned; similar accidents took place in the docks and basins of the several docks, with many fatal results; persons were stopped and robbed in the streets with impunity, and several shops were plundered in day time, without a possibility of effectual interference by the police, so dense was the misty pall that overspread the monster city.

Our Relations With Great Britain.—Washington, Dec. 6.—It has just been ascertained, beyond the possibility of cavil, that a despatch has been received from Mr. Buchanan relative to the Crampton difficulty, the tenor of which is that the British Government, in a courteous, but positive manner, decline giving such explanations as were demanded by our Government, repeating the alleged violation of our neutrality laws by British agents. Another account says that they give too many explanations, and confuse the whole affair as much as possible.

Affairs in Central America.—The governments of San Salvador, Honduras and Costa Rica, have strongly protested to this Government against the recognition by Mr. Wheeler, U. S. Minister, of the present Nicaraguan government. The government of San Salvador predicts that the present order of things in Nicaragua will not long continue, for reasons stated, and declares therein their intention to terminate all foreign adventurers who may invade their soil for revolutionary purposes.

Louis Napoleon is our Grain Market.—The Rochester Union states that the agents of the French Emperor have been largely engaged this fall in purchasing wheat in the West, on his account. They have purchased 300,000 bushels, of which 600,000 came to Buffalo, and 250,000 bushels to Oswego. All but 60,000 went down to the Erie Canal. The same agents are still buying in Illinois and other Western States, to go down the Mississippi and out by New Orleans.

Facts for Consideration.—Canada is rapidly becoming more independent of England. Out of 268,000 pounds of tea imported into Canada last year, only 66,000 came by way of sea, the remainder through the United States. Of £301,000 worth of sugar, only £145,000 worth came by sea. Of molasses, only £28,000 out of an import of £44,000. Of coffee, only £5,000 out of an import of £42,000.

A London Fog.—Few persons can form any idea of the density of a London fog, from what they occasionally see in this country. On the 15th and 16th of November a dense fog prevailed in London and its vicinity, during which steamboats and omnibuses ceased to run, hacks and cabs got on the side walks, numbers of persons walked over the wharves into the Thames, and were drowned; similar accidents took place in the docks and basins of the several docks, with many fatal results; persons were stopped and robbed in the streets with impunity, and several shops were plundered in day time, without a possibility of effectual interference by the police, so dense was the misty pall that overspread the monster city.

Our Relations With Great Britain.—Washington, Dec. 6.—It has just been ascertained, beyond the possibility of cavil, that a despatch has been received from Mr. Buchanan relative to the Crampton difficulty, the tenor of which is that the British Government, in a courteous, but positive manner, decline giving such explanations as were demanded by our Government, repeating the alleged violation of our neutrality laws by British agents. Another account says that they give too many explanations, and confuse the whole affair as much as possible.

Affairs in Central America.—The governments of San Salvador, Honduras and Costa Rica, have strongly protested to this Government against the recognition by Mr. Wheeler, U. S. Minister, of the present Nicaraguan government. The government of San Salvador predicts that the present order of things in Nicaragua will not long continue, for reasons stated, and declare therein their intention to terminate all foreign adventurers who may invade their soil for revolutionary purposes.

Louis Napoleon is our Grain Market.—The Rochester Union states that the agents of the French Emperor have been largely engaged this fall in purchasing wheat in the West, on his account. They have purchased 300,000 bushels, of which 600,000 came to Buffalo, and 250,000 bushels to Oswego. All but 60,000 went down to the Erie Canal. The same agents are still buying in Illinois and other Western States, to go down the Mississippi and out by New Orleans.

Facts for Consideration.—Canada is rapidly becoming more independent of England. Out of 268,000 pounds of tea imported into Canada last year, only 66,000 came by way of sea, the remainder through the United States. Of £301,000 worth of sugar, only £145,000 worth came by sea. Of molasses, only £28,000 out of an import of £44,000. Of coffee, only £5,000 out of an import of £42,000.

A London Fog.—Few persons can form any idea of the density of a London fog, from what they occasionally see in this country. On the 15th and 16th of November a dense fog prevailed in London and its vicinity, during which steamboats and omnibuses ceased to run, hacks and cabs got on the side walks, numbers of persons walked over the wharves into the Thames, and were drowned; similar accidents took place in the docks and basins of the several docks, with many fatal results; persons were stopped and robbed in the streets with impunity, and several shops were plundered in day time, without a possibility of effectual interference by the police, so dense was the misty pall that overspread the monster city.

The Governor's party were from 250 to 300 men, and had left Franklin, a few miles distant, awaiting a greater force.

Reports have reached us that there are 1,000 men in Lawrence, organized and ready for resistance, in connection with Sharpe's rifles, that they are entrenching themselves as rapidly as they possibly can.

From another source we learn that the better men in Lawrence say they are willing to

SATURDAY
EVENING POST.
PHILADELPHIA:
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1856.

Congressional News.

THIRTY-FOURTH CONGRESS.

SENATE.

On the 8th, Mr. Hale's resolution calling on the President of the United States to inform the Senate whether he has received any evidence of such violences as the latter in Kansas as to require the interposition of military force in the preservation or restoration of law and order in that Territory, and if so, to lay the same before the Senate, was taken up.

Mr. Hunter remarked it was unusual to take up such calls before receiving the annual message, which might contain the information desired.

Mr. Hale succeeded that the resolution should lay over, and moved when the Senate adjourns to adjourn till Monday.

Mr. Bunkle hoped not, as the House might organize to-day.

Mr. Clayton remarked that such an adjournment would delay the reception of the message, which the country is anxious to see.

Several Senators urged Mr. Hale to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Hale—In view of the fact stated by the Senator from Delaware (Mr. Clayton) of which I was entirely ignorant, that the country is waiting with great anxiety for the message, I withdraw the motion. [Laughter.]

On the 9th, on motion of Mr. Pratt, Mr. Hickey was appointed Chief Clerk, and J. H. Nicholson, Reading Clerk.

Mr. Pratt presented a petition from Commodore Joseph Smith, remonstrating against the action of the Naval Board in placing him on the retired list.

The Senate proceeded to ballot for Clerk. Mr. Hale, same race, Mr. Hickey of the Clerk.—We have made over a dollar's net note to-day, the session having lasted only seven minutes.

On the 10th, on motion of Mr. Weller, the Select Committee on the Pacific Railroad, appointed at the last session, was ordered to be continued during this, the remainder to be filled by the Chair.

Mr. Adams' resolution, providing for the election of the officers of the Senate, to-day, was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. Bayard gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill providing for the public printing, engraving and binding. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

On the 8th, after the calling of the roll, Mr. W. Gilmer withdrew the name of Humphrey Marshall as a candidate for Speaker.

The House then, on motion, proceeded the balloting for Speaker, for the 21st time, with the following:

Richardson (Dem.) 74, Campbell (Repub.) 46, Pennington (Whig) 30, Fuller (Amer.) 51, Wheeler 10, Banks (Repub.) 35, Smith of Ala. (Amer.) 7, Pelton 1.

On the 9th, the House went through the motion at second, the last vote (77-41) standing as follows:

Banks, 100, Richardson, 72, Fuller, 30, Zollicoffer, 32, Pennington, 2, Scattering 16. Necessary to a choice 122.

There being no election, the House, on motion, adjourned till Monday.

Mr. Cambell announced that there would be a meeting of Anti-Nebraska men to-night in this Hall.

Cries of "What kind of meeting, is that?" "Yes think you'll be things." [Laughter.]

On the 10th, Mr. Thurington offered a resolution, on his own responsibility, providing that the House proceed immediately to the election of a Speaker viva voce, and if, after the roll has been called three times the number of votes cast shall not exceed a majority of the whole number of votes, the roll shall again be called, and the candidate then receiving the largest number of votes, provided it be a majority of a quorum, shall be declared duly elected Speaker.

This proposition fell like a bombshell, occasioning much excitement.

Several members in the same breath moved to lay the resolution on the table, declaring that was the proper place for it. The Clerk called the House to order; the members standing, all over the Hall.

Mr. Giddings, amid great confusion, earnestly appealed to his friend from Iowa to withdraw his resolution, believing that the feeling of the House was becoming more favorable to Mr. Banks.

The ruse and ways having been ordered on laying the resolution on the table, the question was taken whether Mr. Thurington could withdraw it.

Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, appealed to his friends to give Mr. Thurington leave, and persuade the gentleman from Iowa to withdraw the resolution, he being desirous of doing so.

Cries of "no objection"—"agreed"—"call the roll," &c. The resolution being withdrawn, the balloting again resumed the balloting for Speaker. The 20th ballot resulted as follows—Banks 102, Richardson 74, Fuller 31, Scattering 10. Then adjourned.

General News.

NEWS ITEMS.

A MERITED TESTIMONIAL.—A beautiful monument erected in the Hebrew Cemetery, at Newport, R. I., to the memory of Judah Touro, which bears the following inscription:—"The last of his name. He inscribed it to the book of philanthropy, to be remembered forever."

Speaking of the refusal of the London Times to publish Mr. Buchanan's note respecting the neutrality laws, the Montreal Herald says: "Both dishonorable conduct, in a journal noted for its pro-eminent talent, and, consequently, enjoying so vast and unequalled a circulation, is clearly calculated not only to weaken its own influence, but that of journalism throughout the world."

RACHEL'S MURDERER.—Mad'lle Rachel's departure from Charleston, S. C., to Havana, has been deferred until the 19th inst., on account of the nonarrival of her baggage.

The newspaper mill at Little Falls, N. Y., now in course of erection, by Mr. Beardsley, for the manufacture of basswood paper, will be in operation very soon.

IMPORTANT POINT SETTLED.—The Supreme Court of Massachusetts, has decided that to be drunk three times in six months, does not constitute an "habitual drunkard."

EFFECTS OF THE WAR.—Gunpowder, which was ten cents a pound in New York on the opening of the war, has advanced to twenty cents.

CURIOUS ELOPEMENT.—The Chicago Democrat, of Tuesday week, says that a woman arrived in that place, a few days previous, with the dead body of her husband, which she was taking for burial, when at the route she fell in with a young man, and, on the arrival of the cars at Chicago, they went off together, leaving the dead body of the husband in the depot, where it has remained since.

A few days since, an old man of sixty-one years, applied at the office of the city register, Boston, for the fifth marriage certificate, the intended bride is but twenty-four, it being her first marriage. This is the only case within the knowledge of the registrar of a fifth marriage.

A PATRIOTIC DECLINE.—A very small pattern of a man, lately solicited the hand of a fine, buxom lady, of Cincinnati, "said the fair lady, "I can't think of it for a moment. The fact is, John, you are a little too big to put into a cradle, and a little too small to put into a bed."

PROSPECT OF A LONG SESSION.—The first session of the Thirty-fourth Congress, will, most probably, be a very protracted one, as it is proposed to refer Longfellow's "Hiawatha" to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

EXTRAORDINARY MARRIAGE.—Guyer, who arrived here from Cincinnati, on Thursday week, with five other convicts, was married in jail, before he left. The Columbian says:—Guyer's feet were in fetters during the ceremony, and he had just time to kiss his wife, and then he was hurried off to fulfill the punishment of the law. Truly a matrimonial adventure extraordinary."

James Sheridan Knowles has published a book entitled "The Gospel attributed to Matthew is the Record of the whole original Apostleship."

THE LAW OF DESCENT OF PROPERTY.—At the recent term of the U. S. Circuit Court for Rhode Island, the Court sustained the position that upon the death of a grandchild, without children, intestate, his grandfather will take the ancestral estate, rather than the uncles and aunts, though the estate came into the family through the grand maternal branch, the wife of that grandfather.

TELEGRAPHIC REGULATIONS IN PRUSSIA.—The clerks in the telegraph office at Berlin are to be locked up during the time of business, and for two or three hours afterwards, so that they may not be able to betray the secrets of customers. This precaution has been found indispensable.

MAGICK POTATOES.—In the early part of the present century, John Gilky, one of the early settlers of Mercer county, Pa., presented from send the justly celebrated Mercer potato, which was afterwards cultivated by a Mr. Pearson, of Mercer county, in the neighborhood of Darby, Delaware county, Pa., whence it spread over the Union. Thus Gilky, a poor solitary exile of Erin," has done more to benefit mankind than many a horde of hundred battles, and it has been proposed to immortalize his humble scene by calling the "Mercers" from henceforth, "potatoes of Gilkum."

HEAVY DAMAGES.—The Delaware County Republican states that the trial of Judge Kane for false imprisonment will probably take place in February next. Passmore Williamson claims $50,000 damages.

SALE OF WEIR'S CAVE.—Mr. William Mohler, the owner of the celebrated Weir's Cave in Augusta county, Va., has sold it to Messrs. Davis Craig and John Parkins for $10,000. There are 60 acres of land included in the sale. The Cave is still to be kept open for the public.

LEGISLATIVE GALLANTRY.—In the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania, in 1850, while a bill granting pensions to certain revolutionary veterans was pending in that body, Mr. Mathias moved to add a gratuity of $40 to one Sarah Cross "the sweetheart of an old soldier," which motion prevailed, 45 to 26.

A NEW WHEAT.—A clergyman, writing to the Commissioner of Patents from Hillsboro, Oregon Territory, states that he has discovered a new kind of grain resembling wheat, which, if it will yet make bread, will make an excellent food for cattle. The grain is said to be very heavy—the heads yielding a hundred fold each. Samples of this grain were received with the letter.

A MURDER TRIAL IN CANADA.—At the last session in Whitby, C. W., a farmer, named Reuben Crandall, of Reach, and his two sons, were tried for the murder of Stephen Smith, fourteen years ago. A witness, named Brock, testified most positively that he saw the accused commit the murder, while other witnesses proved that Smith had been seen alive by them six months after the time of his alleged murder. The jury at once acquitted the prisoners.

THE STOCK MARKET.

CORRECTED FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, By McHENRY & BELL, STOCK AND BILL BROKERS.

No. 300 Walnut Street.

The following were the closing quotations for Stocks on Monday last:

	Market closing steady:
	Bid	Asked
Loans.
U S 6 per ct 1858	100
U S 6 per ct 1860	105½
U S 6 per ct 1861	115½
U S 6 per ct 1862	115½
Int	2	3
Int	2	3
Phila 5 per ct	75½
Do	75
Cam Coy 5 per ct	99
Cam & Am 6 per ct	100
City 6 per ct	100
All gov stock	2	3
Do coupons	2	3
Allegheny R R	100
Penna 5 per ct	100
Do 6 per ct	100
Do coupons	2	3
Do 3 per ct	100
Cheste Co 5 per ct	100
Reading 6 per ct	100
Do 5 per ct	100
Schuylkill 6 per ct	100
Do 5 per ct	100
Penna R R	50
Do coupons	2	3
Cam & Amboy R R	100
Do coupons	2	3
Do 6 per ct	100
Do 5 per ct	100
Do 3 per ct

Selected Poetry.

MY UTOPIA!

BY W. S. HERNDEN.

When I a king—mark a king!
Have nearly my own to do,
My revolving empire is my head,
Of which I am king—mark a king!

Not those who are subject to me
Should rule a state, my people's owner;
He her should make, with wise design,
My justice their separate owner.

To right all wrongs, my court should sit,
Not from the wronged their all to wring!
Not "member of the law," yond'st owner
When I a king—mark I a king!

Not war all that ignorance breeds,
Made clan—mark evil, would I rule;
No court of all my crowned brows,
No village, but should hear its school;

To foster the wronged—to love the right,
My teaching each should all men bring!
Not jails, nor gallows check the night,
When I a king—mark I a king!

"Yes, Cambridge—Oxford," would I say,
"Not for a class's good you stand;
Your ancient founders willed your halls
To hold in sentiment of the land.

Away with thoughts of sect and rank!
Your doors to genius open fling!
Give welcome male all!" I'd say,
When I a king—mark I a king!

"To I—statesman, you to whom I give
The evils of my realm to cure,
Just heds," I'd say, "and righteous aims,
Alike for all—for rich—for poor;

To symbol heavier—to hungry homes,
Look that your rule same comfort bring!"
Proof—Science—Faith, I'd have for all,
When I a king—mark I a king!

"To each my people," I would I say,
"Off with your cloak of: you overawing here
From this ever-crowded hive, go, hear
Your English strength beyond the sea:
That with in work you hearts, grey,
To whom your work shall shadow bring!
Go—greater Englands dwell!" I'd say,
When I a king—mark I a king!

What yields I'd for my people, I say?
What gifts do I for their works provide thing?
My purpose: Old welcome, stay,
Mechanics! that to every room,
With holiday my realm should chase;
Employment and to all a wing!
My primary should make poor man glad,
When I a king—mark I a king!

Lovers of the lowly and the poor,
My Church's reversal priests should live,
To subject power—to Ulled rice,
Not shrinking days repent to give;
Inside of to-day, their cry
Should, strong to smite all evil, ring;
Such, they should serve in truth their God,
When I a king—mark I a king!

You smile, yet some purchase may sale
For trouble what you but fancies call;
Those made the will, we have the power
To give among them into all;
Ah! in might thrice blin in our hearts
Where'd strive to do what I but sing,
What I so feel I'd long to do!
When I a king—mark I a king!

Selected Sketch.

MAGISTER TINIUS AND HIS HAMMER.

BY WILLIAM HOWITT.

The story of Eugene Aram will always remain a wonderful story. That a young man of high intellectual endowments, with a passion for literature, with a feeling and an appetite for the intellectual, with a perception of all that knowledge and accomplishment can endow men with, and with an ambition to seize on those advantages, and climb to those lofty honors, which they place within the reach of the gifted, should condescend to feel his hands with low murder—to contaminate his soul with crimes, that libations of genius, no hallucinations of a sanguine spirit, could possibly clothe in his own fancied vision, in any guise of an exciting glorious, in one of the enigmas of humanity that are most difficult of solution. In the case of Aram, poverty and pride combined to impel him to seek the enjoyment of books by a means by which any book he had must be made a chary upholder and accuser; to snatch intellectual enjoyment out of the very hands of shame and degradation. He sought to climb to distinction, not over the ordinary rocks, and steeps, and rugged falls which beset the way of the poor but high-souled aspirant, but by a short and desperate sideway of assassination. He would be honorable through dishonor, glorious through infamy, and reap the priceless rewards of genius, through all that genius is created to denounce and to render despicable. He endeavored to spring from the low obscurity in which he was born, by the lowest and most obscure of crimes. Instead of taking the way of genius, he took that which led rightfully to the gallows; and thither he came, winning what he deserved instead of what he aimed at. In him strong and fiery passions, an intense ambition, a sanguine temperament, an impetuous rush towards a broader, more brilliant sphere of action, have down and trampled upon that noble principle, which alone can win, by the possession of great powers, a great and genuine immortality. Such headlong impulses can palliate many failings, but they could not palliate his crime, which had in it the villainous resistance of the low-lost footpad, not the giant darling of the hour; and he remains swinging in chains on the gibbet of the malefactors, a shoal of standing in severe stability on the pedestal of fame which he might have reached by better means.

But Eugene Aram is not the solitary example of this sort of character. We have known in our time, the passion for books mixed up in a most singular manner with a turbid rascality. We have seen the same man reading with avidity whatever was noblest or purest in our literature, and all the time living in the daily commission of deeds which were of the most utterly ignominious and base nature. We have seen a man at once a real poet, a brilliant writer of fiction, an associate with the good and distinguished, and a knave and an impostor of the lowest grade. How such powers and qualities came to meet and live together in one body, we leave to the psychologist to explain. Rare as the instances are, however, they do exist, for we have seen them.

We do not include amongst these such men as Wainwright, the James Weathercock of the "London Magazine," the literary associate and social chum of Charles Lamb, Hazlitt, and other celebrated men, who exposed his villanies by transportation for life—for on the face of all that he wrote there is the stamp of the arrogant dandy and the charlatan. More genuine of this class is a strange example which Germany has produced. That is, the Magister Tinius, a Protestant clergyman, a very popular preacher, an extraordinary bibliomaniac, and a murderer of a very curious description. Still he differed widely from our Eugene Aram. He had a love of books rather than of what they contained; and instead of passion and impulse, he possessed a cold heart, a close bosom, a steady, calculating head, and a daring hand. He was a modern Thar—his favorite weapon being a hammer.

In the commencement of the year 1812, the murder of a wealthy merchant, by daylight, and in the very midst of the peaceful city of Leipsic, created a vast sensation; and the impression on the inhabitants was the more fearful, that, spite of the most active research, the mysterious perpetrator remained undiscovered.

A person of apparently forty years of age, a stranger, called, on the morning of the 28th of February, between ten and eleven o'clock, on the aged merchant Schmidt, who lived in a house of his own in Grimm street. The visitor announced himself as from Hamburg, and was recommended to him as the best qualified to advise in a matter of business. He was desirous of investing some money, and not finding what he wanted in Hamburg, had resolved to look about for that purpose in Saxony. He asked him whether he deemed the purchase of an estate, or of bonds government scrip, the more advisable.

This merchant, in the course of conversation on this subject, which lasted about half an hour, produced, at the suggestion of the stranger, a Leipsic states' obligation of one hundred dollars, permitted him-do examine it, and then returned it to its drawer in his writing table. But as this was done, the stranger suddenly fixed to fleer Schmidt his muff, and at once fell senseless to the floor.

When Schmidt came to himself again, he found himself bleeding profusely from the head, and cried out, "Help me up!" But the stranger was not there. When he did move, and had with difficulty managed to raise himself, he saw these drawers of his writing-table standing empty, and the chairs disposed in great disorder. The fear that he was robbed, gave him strength to seat himself, and bleeding as he was, he examined his drawers, and found that eleven Leipsic state obligations, to the value of 4,000 dollars, were carried off.

He quickly called the wife of his housekeeper, Vetter, had his hurt hastily bound up, and hastened to the police-office to announce the fact of the robbery, and hand in the number of the pieces of scrip that he had lost. This, as well as the circular which he immediately sent off to the Schmidt bankers of the city, forbidding payment of any such, for the eleven obligations, had been scarcely completed, when Frege & Co., the bankers, had paid for eight, and it was too late to stop them.

In the very room lent in which the stranger had been with Mr. Schmidt, that in, between ten and eleven o'clock, according to the people of the house, a stranger appeared in the chief lodgers apartment, and had exchanged the fifty-five rooms various common chamber and French, imparting a certain amount of elegance. There was no signs of anxiety or rightness observable in the man. He had scarcely exhausted the different rooms he had to receive, entered hastily over the cabin, and inquired some particular phrase that Mr. Schmidt, mentioned without hesitation.

The description of this person, as given by the people at the hotel against parting with that of Mr. Vetter, the merchant's housekeeper, and was sent at once in the newspapers. According to this statement the stranger was dressed like a country shopkeeper, and completely full upon one Von Burger. The cashier of the bank was confident in his recognition of the prisoner in the person; but neither the other clerks, nor Mr. Vetter, nor the merchant himself, agreed in this recognition, and Von Burger was discharged.

From Schmidt himself, the best certain information of all was to be obtained. True, he affirmed all that has been here stated by cash; but never and his would had rubbed lips of his strength of mind to such a degree, that he was able to state nothing clearly as to the figure and garb of the offender. Neither could he say whether the man had struck him on the head, or whether he had received his wounds from falling against the corner of the stove. Before the extensive injuries of his head were healed, the old man died, clearly from the consequence of the wounds, and after a painful period of confinement to his bed.

The surgeons made a post-mortem examination of the head, and declared that the violence done had been effected with such force; that there were evidences of many heavy blows on the skull; and he should not positively vouch from a mere fall, and the striking even of the head against a hard substance. The wounds were in different parts of the head, and appeared of one oblique shape, through their outline could not be wholly stated, from the trouble being no longer fresh.

It was clear that the old man had been murdered for his property; but all traces of the perpetrator had vanished, and the mystery remained in connection with him, till, a year afterwards, a similar and not less startling outrage, in the very same city, led to renewed inquiry, and to the discovery of traces in a quarter where no one had suspected them.

In the New Market, in the fourth story of the house of Dr. Kantz, there lived the widow of the before-named Kunhardt, at an old lady of seventy-five. On the morning of the 8th of February, she had sent her maid-servant, Schmidt, soon after eight o'clock, to fetch a bottle of wine from the vaults. As the maid returned from this errand, she met a magister (a master of arts) in the lobby of the house, whom she had already known as a frequenter of the hotel where she had formerly lived. He spoke to her as he passed, and hastened out of the door, and down the steps.

When she went into her mistress, she found her fallen against the room door, bleeding from the head. The old lady was able to speak, and said that a stranger who had brought a letter, which lay near her on the floor, had thus wounded her. At the cries of the maid, the inhabitants of the other stories, the families of Dr. Kunhardt and Kantz, hastened in, and carried the poor woman into her sitting-room. In reply to their inquiries, she said: "A fellow has struck me; I know better must be them; I am glad that I have my chain." Being asked if she knew the man, she said "no." The letter, spotted with blood, was dated Schandorf, January 14th, and signed John Godfrey Brune, and requested the loan of 1,000 dollars. There was blood on the wall and the floor of the room.

An inquiry was instituted by the police early the same forenoon, but on arriving at the dwelling of the widow Kunhardt, she was already speechless and insensible. The maid repeated her testimony as above, and added that she felt sure it was Magister K——, whom she had often seen in her former service. This man was immediately arrested; but on seeing him, the maid at once declared that he was not the person she meant; it was another person who used to come to her former master's. The suspicion now fell on Tinius, the parish priest of Pouerna, near Leipsic, who not only frequented the house in question, but had been there the previous night, and left it at eight o'clock that morning, saying that he was going to call on one of the magistrates, and came back at nine, having, on the way, bought a book at a second-hand shop, and read the newspapers at the museum.

Tinius was a man on whom it was a matter of the utmost astonishment that such a suspicion should fall. He had been the incumbent of the village of Pouerna for some years, and was celebrated in the country round as a most popular and impressive preacher. His church was regularly crowded, and people came from great distances to hear him. He had been twice married, each time, to a widow who brought him property. He was the father of a family, and had entered on his present living with the highest testimonials as to character and acquirements. He was not only a popular preacher, but an author; and amongst other works, had written an autobiography. A man who thus courted inquiry into his life, and brought it into the full blaze of public observation, appeared a very unlikely person to commit crimes of this atrocity. His great passion, however, was that of buying books. These he collected on all hands, purchasing up whole libraries at second-hand, and being in active communication with book collectors and second-hand dealers. His library had now grown to the extraordinary amount, for a country parson, of 60,000 volumes. He boasted that he had even outdoed the Prince Royal of Saxony, in one occasion. A reason alleged for this book extravagance was, that he was not only intensely fond of the pursuit, but contemplated a great trade with America in books.

But spite of all this, the magistrates of Leipsic entertained the suspicion excited by the girl before-named. Her description of the person of the murderer (for the old lady died) exactly agreed with that of Tinius, and an officer was dispatched to Pouerna with the maid Schmidt, in order that she might get a good view of him, without any one seeming to be particularly in quest of him.

The girl proposed to go to the parsonage on some concocted message, and Tinius was just leaving thence as she came up to the door. She at once recognized him as the man, who not only came out of the room where her mistress lay in her blood, but whom she had seen and spoken to on the stairs two days before. After her first evidence, she recollected to have met him on the very same man on the common main two days previously. He was then inquiring for Madame Kunitz, who lived on the next floor, and though it was somewhat dark on the stairs, he immediately recognized her as the maid who used to live at the house where he lodged when in town, and spoke to her as such. At that time he looked pale and agitated.

Now he appeared struck at the sight of her, not affected not to know her; he asked rapidly where she was from, and without waiting for an answer, added: "Ah! from Wiesenfelds."

Tinius was taken up; but the examination and trial of this singular person, owing to his positive and persevering denial of the charges in his address, to the circumstance that this charge rested on circumstantial evidence, especially that of the girl Schmidt, and to the circumstance of the times—the war and coming peace, the next stroke of Tinius, Pouerna, being transferred to Prussia, and consequently, her minister being to be secured by Prussian authorities—lasted ten years.

From the voluminous records of this curious case, we may select the following facts: John George Tinius was born in 1766, in a country place in Niederlausitz. His father was the governor of the royal house of Prussia. He was educated through the assistance of benevolent people, because he evinced a disposition for study; was sent to the University of Wittenburg, Luther's old Alma-mater, became a private tutor in different families, afterwards a teacher in the gymnasium of Schleissingen, and was first made pastor of Reinsdorfe in Hesse-Homburg, and finally in 1809, incumbent of Pouerna, near Wiesenfelds.

In all these places he maintained the best possible character. The college heads and clergymen where he had been, declared that both by his talents and his conduct, he had excited great expectations in them, and had quite gained their esteem. They regretted his so very conscientious in the discharge of his duties. His manners and morals were of the strictest purity; he had always been sincerely regretted when he had left a place, and his preaching had excited extraordinary attention, and drawn together large numbers of people.

Such was the man now accused of this singular and atrocious crime. Once under suspicion, however, there were not wanting those who professed to have seen something clear, dark, and mysterious in him. Others had felt a strange and unaccountable antipathy to him, or want of faith in him. It was whispered that he had been always a severe husband, and harsh step-father. There was something in his personal appearance that strengthened these rumors and personal feelings. He was a man of middle size, of about forty years of age, pale of countenance, his nose large and determined, his hair sense black, smooth, and hanging lankly on each side of his head. There was a still, penetrating, and inquiring look in his eyes; and his dress was a black frock coat, waistcoat, and breeches of clerical cut, with a broad clerical hat, &c., and with his head sank as if in deep thought.

Not the least of these reports and these characteristics now become the subjects of much remark, but various suspicions visits to other parties were now recollected; amongst others, to his mother-in-law at midnight, and to a country magistrate of the name of Hoffmann, an old and wealthy man. He had gone there in the dark of a winter's evening when there was a deep snow, had wished to see him alone, and when admitted, had given a false name. Longer, and pretended that he wanted to see an estate that the magistrate had to sell. The old man replied, that it was not in time to look over an estate in a case, and also informed him that he knew him very well to be Tinius, formerly clergyman of Heinrichs. He confessed that it was so, but that he had been requested by the friend who wanted to buy the estate, to give no clue whatever to the purchaser, and, therefore, he wished to appear as a stranger. On inquiry, it was found out while waiting to be introduced to Mr. Hoffmann, as there was another gentleman with him, he had expressly refused to see him while that gentleman was there, and had also inquired of the servants whether they had any other people living in the house, whether they had a watchman, and whether their dogs were fierce. All this time an old servant knew him.

These and similar incidents coming to memory and public remark, there spread with them also a story that Tinius was accustomed to carry a snuff-box, which he had offered on all these suspicion occasions, the smell of which had a peculiar stupefying effect; and, moreover, that he carried in the side pocket of his cloak a short-handled hammer! It was, therefore, immediately suggested to the public imagination that he had committed the murder of Madame Kunhardt by offering her his snuff-box while reading the letter he had presented to her, and when she had fallen stupefied, then struck her on the head with the hammer. This idea fully agreed with the nature of the wounds given both to her and to the merchant, Schmidt. On the heads of both victims there were several wounds which had all the appearance of being produced by violent strokes with a hammer. The idea of Madame Schmidt had partly escaped the public recollection, but Tinius himself had recalled the remembrance of it by writing to one of his friends from the prison, that "if anything should be said of the murder of Schmidt"—of which, however, nothing was said or thought—"he should say"—so-and-so.

All these things put together completed the horrible idea of a man wrapped in a long, dark blue cloak, with his pale, sallow face, and large eagle nose, peering out, with a peculiarly piercing pair of eyes, from amidst his black, sleek hanging hair, and having on sometimes his cap shoved back, sometimes a dark velvet cap, carrying about with him his drugged snuff-box and his short-handled hammer. He was thus pictured making evening or nocturnal visits to people in solitary places and in the depth of winter, and watching his opportunity to offer his snuff-box, tap the unlucky accepter of a pinch, in the confusion of taking it, on the head with the hammer, and then ransacking his desk or his cabinet. His mother-in-law had money, the Amtmann Hoffmann had money, and Tinius, it was well known, wanted it. When the old lady, his wife's mother, found him standing by her, who had awoke, "rec ther and his dark velvet cap, she cried out in alarm, and he replied, "Hush! hush!" and made some excuse for his odd visit; he stayed with Hoffmann in his private room alone till half-past ten o'clock that winter's night! A narrow escape for both of these people, and only owing to the proximity of other people.

We may say this, for the story of the snuff-box and the hammer was no fable. His wife had found the hammer in the pocket of his cloak at the very time that he returned from the murder of Mrs. Kunhardt, and wondered at it; and when she swooned at him that she was aware that he had two such odd short-handled hammers, he was furious, and she only escaped being struck by him by running from the room. Her conviction of his conduct was early known, while he was on his trial, by her getting a legal separation from him on the plea of the assurance of his guilt, and she gave the story of the hammer, and of his strange visit to her mother, as amongst the reasons of her separation.

But, however difficult it appeared to a German tribunal to bring home the murder of Mrs. Kunhardt to him, there would have been no difficulty to an English jury. The maid Schmidt, a girl of the best and most trustworthy character, swore positively to his identity as the man who came immediately from the room where her mistress was lying in her blood. She swore this as knowing him well in her former service of the inn. Her mistress said that a fellow had struck her on the head, after presenting a letter which was signed with a feigned name, a name afterwards found amongst his papers, and occurring in his own autobiography. She, and other people had seen him twice, just at that time, in the house; and if proof was still wanting, he himself gave it by writing to one of his friends—as he thought him—out of doors, to secure his papers before the police could; and when this did not succeed, writing to other friends to say this and that in his favor before the judges: all false, and one story contradicting another. These friends, instead of doing his dirty work, gave up the letters as evidence, in a proper indignation at being supposed by him capable of such baseness. Amongst his papers were found copies of letters, in a feigned hand and with feigned signatures, sent to different people, and amongst them one to the Amtmann Hoffmann. These were letters like those of our Joseph Ady, letting wealthy people, to hear of something to their advantage," so as to get into communication with them, especially to a rich Miss Rose, informing her of a vast property fallen to her in America.

On his trial, he made many ingenious attempts to prove an alibi; and there were fellow of evidence endeavoring to prove that he did not wear a cloak and cap on the day of the Kunhardt murder, but a coat. All, however, eventually availed him little. There could be no proof of his murder of Schmidt brought; but for the murder of Madame Kunhardt, after ten years of clever shuffling and wriggling, he was condemned to twenty years' imprisonment, which was afterwards mitigated to ten years for the Kunhardt murder, and 10s for the embezzlement of certain church moneys. Twelve years' confinement! a singularly lenient sentence for such crimes. His parishioners of course expelled him from their church and appointed a successor, but on his quitting prison allowed him a moderate maintenance. What afterwards

City Scenes.

LIFE IN PITTSBURG.

Poor Sukie!—Just as he meets these nice girls he admired so at M's party, an enormous black duke settles on his nose. He loses all presence of mind.

Wit and Humor.

LADIES' HOOPS.

It cannot be, it cannot be
The lady who was yesterday,
Who would I guess a parting kiss,
But now can it be down in this?
Why pshaw! to her thought down,
And be sighed out in close distance.

[illegible]
Ah me—it makes one look so queer
And feel five steps it remotely thing!
Oh, gentlemen! say: what shall I do?
We can't (?) to make a last embrace,
When hoop opposite with this to face.

He walked the lady round and round,
But sadness fascinated upon a wound,
Scarcely opened and footed,
As if it upon the ground
They? [illegible]
He walked the lady round and round,
Oh, love, how could you serve me so!
Farewell—farewell—hoop finds I'll hodge,
As least until the fashions change.

He went to Cuba [illegible]
And in her hoop she walked away;
The world came called her quite the cut,
And she was honored, in fact, like one
Such belted beauty ever wore a mock.
They dance now, a hoopless each.

AN EXAMINER HUMBUG.—Wyberly, the comedian, married a girl of eighteen, when he was verging on eighty. Shortly after, Providence was pleased, in its mercy to the young woman, to call the old man to another and a better world. But one he took his final departure from this, he secured his young wife with to his bedside, and announced to her that he was dying; whereupon she wept bitterly. Wyberly lifted himself up in the bed, and gazing with leather condition on her weeping wife, said—

"My dearest love, I have a solemn promise to exact from you before I quit your side forever here before. Will you assure me my wishes will be attended to by you, however great the sacrifice you will be called on to make?"

Horrid ideas of sutticee, of poor Indian widows being called on to expire on funeral pyres, with the bodies of their deceased lords and masters, flashed across the brain of the poor woman. With convulsive effort and desperate resolution, she gasped out an assurance that his commands, however dreadful they might be, should be obeyed.

Then Wyberly, with a ghastly smile, said, in a low and sonorous voice:

"My beloved wife, the parting request I have to make of you, is—that when I am gone, (here the poor woman sobbed and cried most vehemently,) when I am in my cold grave—(Mrs. Wyberly tore her hair,)—when I am no longer a heavy burden and a tax on you—(Oh, for Heaven's sake!" howled Mrs. W., "what can I do?)—I command you, my dear young wife—(yes, y-e-s, love," sobbed Mrs. W.)—on pain of incurring my malediction—(y-e-s, dear,' groaned the horror-stricken wife,)—never to marry an old man again!"

Mrs. Wyberly dried her eyes, and, in the most fervent manner, promised that she never would—and the faithful woman kept her word for life.

HONORABLE LIBERATORS.—A friend told us recently that our anecdotes of the legislator who wanted the Constitution to run through his farm, and of his worthy brother who did not think his constituents had any sense, reminded him of the freaks of a distinguished Michigan legislator, who, in his day, was the unfailing source of half the fun at the Capitol. Upon one occasion, while some resolutions were under discussion which involved an endorsement of the action of the Michigan delegation in Congress upon the tariff question, this gentleman sprang upon his feet, exclaiming:

"Mr. President! I move to amend the resolution by adding the following, viz.: Resolved, that the Senators and Representatives from this Michigan be instructed to vote for no material bill whatever, unless it shall have been previously printed and published."

As if it upon the dried
Very well, if you that keep should one,
Then I'll [illegible] to be
He walked the lady round and round,
Oh, love, how could you serve me so!
Farewell—farewell—hoop finds I'll hodge,
As least until the fashions change.

AN EXAMINER HUMBUG.—Wyberly, the comedian, married a girl of eighteen, when he was verging on eighty. Shortly after, Providence was pleased, in its mercy to the young woman, to call the old man to another and a better world. But one he took his final departure from this, he secured his young wife with to his bedside, and announced to her that he was dying; whereupon she wept bitterly. Wyberly lifted himself up in the bed, and gazing with leather condition on her weeping wife, said—

"My dearest love, I have a solemn promise to exact from you before I quit your side forever here before. Will you assure me my wishes will be attended to by you, however great the sacrifice you will be called on to make?"

Horrid ideas of sutticee, of poor Indian widows being called on to expire on funeral pyres, with the bodies of their deceased lords and masters, flashed across the brain of the poor woman. With convulsive effort and desperate resolution, she gasped out an assurance that his commands, however dreadful they might be, should be obeyed.

Then Wyberly, with a ghastly smile, said, in a low and sonorous voice:

"My beloved wife, the parting request I have to make of you, is—that when I am gone, (here the poor woman sobbed and cried most vehemently,) when I am in my cold grave—(Mrs. Wyberly tore her hair,)—when I am no longer a heavy burden and a tax on you—(Oh, for Heaven's sake!" howled Mrs. W., "what can I do?)—I command you, my dear young wife—(yes, y-e-s, love,' sobbed Mrs. W.)—on pain of incurring my malediction—(y-e-s, dear,' groaned the horror-stricken wife,)—never to marry an old man again!"

Mrs. Wyberly dried her eyes, and, in the most fervent manner, promised that she never would—and the faithful woman kept her word for life.

HONORABLE LIBERATORS.—A friend told us recently that our anecdotes of the legislator who wanted the Constitution to run through his farm, and of his worthy brother who did not think his constituents had any sense, reminded him of the freaks of a distinguished Michigan legislator, who, in his day, was the unfailing source of half the fun at the Capitol. Upon one occasion, while some resolutions were under discussion which involved an endorsement of the action of the Michigan delegation in Congress upon the tariff question, this gentleman sprang upon his feet, exclaiming:

"Mr. President! I move to amend the resolution by adding the following, viz.: Resolved, that the Senators and Representatives from this Michigan be instructed to vote for no material bill whatever, unless it shall have been previously printed and published.

[illegible]

Oh, gentlemen! say: what shall I do?
We can't (?) to make a last embrace,
When hoop opposite with this to face.

He walked the lady round and round,
But sadness fascinated upon a wound,
Scarcely opened and footed,
As if it upon the dried
Very well, if you that keep should one,
Then I'll [illegible] to be
He walked the lady round and round,
Oh, love, how could you serve me so!
Farewell—farewell—hoop finds I'll hodge,
As least until the fashions change.

He went to Cuba [illegible]
And in her hoop she walked away;
The world came called her quite the cut,
And she was honored, in fact, like one
Such belted beauty ever wore a mock.
They dance now, a hoopless each